Saving The Shepherd Is. There is an irrepressible satisfaction in finding that a great philosopher in the innocent ways of life, very much like other men, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, whose Meditations have been the guide of thinkers for centuries, wrote some exceedingly human letters to his teacher and friend, Marcus Cornelius Fronto. One of them contains the following epice of boyish fun:

When my father returned home from the vineyards, I mounted my horse, as usual and rode on ahead some little way. Well, there on the road was a hard of sheep, standing all crowded together as if the place were a desert, with four dogs and two shepherds, but nothing else. Then one shepherd said to another, on seeing a number of horsemen: "I say, look at those horsemen! They do a deal of robbery." When I heard this, I clap spurs to my horse and ride straight for the sheep. My consternation the sheep scatter, Hitho, and thither they are fleeing and bleating A shepherd throws his fork, and the fork falls on the horseman who comes next to me. We make our escape.
