POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

MANSION-HOUSE.

An Odd Scene.—The Lord Mayor, in the course of his business, was interrupted by a sailor, a showman, and a monkey, who arrived at the Justice-room, with a great multitude behind them.

The monkey was making a most hideous noise, and the sailor and showman, who had been arguing on their way to the Mansion-House, were so completely absorbed in the subject of dispute, as not to take notice, for some time, of the authority presiding. The monkey, however, was more respectful in his manners, and seemed to have a due impression of the dignity of the Magistrate before whom he was brought.

His Lordship having noticed the respectful demeanor of the monkey, called upon the sailor and showman to follow the example of the animal, who at that moment began to exhibit some of his most amusing tricks—such as pulling the showman's nose, untying his cravat, dragging open his waistcoat, &c.

The Lord Mayor desired that if there was any complaint to be made it should be proceeded upon. The sailor said he and the monkey were the injured party; the showman was the aggressor.

His Lordship seemed to think that the monkey could be as well able to explain the matter as either of his companions, and this conclusion appeared to be just, for while the features of the men were agitated with passion, the monkey's was as grave as those of a philosopher.

The monkey kept his eye fixed upon the Lord Mayor, and at the conclusion of every sentence from his Lordship, uttered a piercing cry.

The sailor at length made his complaint. He stated that he went into Gilman and Atkin's exhibition of wild beasts in Bartholomew Fair, and while he was looking at the curiosities he recognised the monkey, which was now before his Lordship, to be his own property. He had purchased it for four or five dollars at St. Kitt's, some months ago, and upon his arrival in this country, he had lost it at Portsmouth. Upon entering the show he immediately told the keeper that it was his monkey, and have it he would. The keeper refused to give up, and declared that his master had bought it fairly for one pound.

The showman here got into a high passion with the monkey, who had seized him with such violence by the nose as to make him roar out. The animal growing more and more averse to the controul of the keeper, held his paws out to the sailor, and moaned piteously.

The Lord Mayor said, the only way for him to decide upon a case, in which there was positive assertions on both sides, was to leave the matter to the monkey himself. His Lordship then directed that the monkey should be placed upon the table, and that each party claiming him should use his powers of fascination, in order to ascertain to whom the monkey was most attached.

The monkey was put upon the table, but narrowly escaped death, from an attack made upon him by a dog, a constant visitor at the Mansion-House. Having escaped this danger, the Lord Mayor marked the effect of so important an adventure, and seeing that the monkey fled to the arms of the sailor (who shewed most concern) for protection, and that the animal throughout had evinced towards him the greatest attachment, he thought he was the rightful owner. The desired experiment, however, was now made, and the showman put a piece of stick into the monkey's paw, and desired him to shoulder arms. Instead of obeying this order, the monkey struck the keeper on the head, and then threw it in his face.

The sailor next called upon the animal, saying, Jack, "look sharp, and make a salam to his Lordship." The monkey instantly stood erect on his hind legs, and put his paws to the top of his head, and made a low bow to the Lord Mayor in the Turkish style. He then hugged and fawned upon the sailor as before.

"If any thing else is necessary," said the sailor, "to prove him mine, I can shew it. There is a hole in one of his ears which I bored in St. Kitt's, for it is fashionable for the bucks to wear an ear-ring there. His left paw is marked by a fishing-hook, and part of his tail is bitten by a parrot that used to quarrel with him." These marks were observed.

The Lord Mayor advised the showman to give up all claim to the monkey, but he refused. The sailor refused to part with the monkey, and the monkey would not part with him. The disputants at length left the Office, the monkey clinging to the neck of the sailor in the most affectionate manner.
