

POETRY. THE WORM.

Enjoy, vain Man, the feast to-day,
The present hour will soon be past,
The laden board will pass away,
The Worm will feed on thee at last.

Quick circle round the goblet flood,
To-day the banquet brims for thee;
To-morrow he will pledge thy blood
In dark sepulchral revelry.

Rich are the dainties that he knows,
From beauties pale lip sips the dew;
Diets upon her velvet rose,
And eats the heart of valour through.

He shall impress an icy kiss,
Where warmer lovers vainly sighed;
The secrets of that heart are his,
Where never yet observer pry'd.

And, if within the Sage's brain
Of learning past remaineth aught,
He'll wander through and through again,
And trace the labyrinth of thought.

Yet start not, slumberer, he will creep,
Light as a feather o'er thy breast;
Nor mar one moment of thy sleep—
An harmless, inoffensive guest.

Unfelt, as Time's light shadow flies,
E'en to thyself the change unknown,
The worm that gnaws and never dies,
Exists in living breasts alone.

Whitlow—how to treat it.

This disease is often a severe affliction to hard working men, such as farmers. It originates from bruises or punctures that inflame the muscles, tendons or membranes beneath the skin—these swellings, whilst the hard tough skin of the fingers remain unyielding, causes the great pain, and extension of it up the arm—the thick skin of the fingers also prevents any exudation or escape of purulent matter, and thus the bone becomes diseased, and a joint is lost. Persons with soft fingers are seldom attacked. An artificial and similar disease may be formed at any time by winding a string round an inflamed finger, or by sowing it up in a piece of unyielding leather. In this case the most stupid person would think only of cutting the string or ripping the leather, and yet it is rarely that you see a physician go to work in this rational manner. He must first salve it, and plaster it with some ointment, which is just as likely to make a cure as the treading on it, that is practised by ignorant people before it becomes intolerable—by such practices and such neglect, the disease often runs on till nature makes a gap, and the physician modestly charges for what another has done. The proper remedy is simple and easy: lay open this thick skin, the whole length of the swelling, and dress the finger for one or two days with a soft poultice of bread and milk, and then lay lint on the wound—a little red precipitate ointment may be necessary where the proud flesh does not separate freely. The writer of this has relieved many persons without the loss of a joint, and has followed no other plan for 20 years.—[Nat. Gaz.]
