EXECUTION.

London, Dec. 3, 1826.

The sentence of death was on Wednesday morning carried into effect upon John Ha[ye]s, aged 25, James Boyce, 24, Robt. King, 20, John Robinson, 19, George Nicholls, 24, and James Goulby, 18.

The Execution of six men at one time excited an extraordinary degree of public sympathy, which, laying aside pity for the wretched fate of so many young men, was in some degree checked when the great enormity of their crimes was considered. The five last named culprits were connected with the gangs of desperate robbers, who have lately been the terror of the north eastern part of the metropolis, and have put the peaceable inhabitants of Hackney, Homerton, Bethnal green, and Hagerstone, under contributions at various times, in the most outrageous and lawless manner. The gang was called the "Bethnal green gang," and their desperate violence is matter of sufficient notority.

Boyce was tried with his brother, who was acquitted, and a youth, named Georg[e] Houghton, alias "Pretty George," now under sentance of death, in the September Sessions, for attacking and robbing, in the manner described, a gentleman, named Fuller, a surgeon, residing on Cambridge heath, Hackney, and Mr. James French, in Hare-street, Bethnal green, on the 26th of July last. Both the prosecutors were beaten in a brutal manner, and plundered of considerable property. Boyce was apprehended on Mr. Fuller's charge, and, when placed at the bar of Worship-street office, Mr. French, who had been previously sent for, on seeing him, said, "That's the man that gave me this wound," pointing to his forehead ; "I would swear to him, if I saw him amongst a thousand."

John Hayes was convicted of a burglary in the house of Captain William Larkins Pascall, in the East India road, in July last. He had lived in Captain Pascall's family, and was detected in Hounsditch, offering some of the property for sale. He made considerable resistance upon the persons taking him into custody,

The crowd assembled to witness the awful scene was unusually great,

The culprits passed the greater part of Tuesday night in sleep, but as early as five o'clock, were attended by their respective clergymen. Hayes remained in his cell with Mr. Devereux, and two religious gentlemen, until seven o'clock ; he then, in the most penitent manner, received the Sacrament.

The other culprits were in a ward in the gallery above the Press-room, where they joined in such psalms and prayers as the sacred ritual of the Church have set apart as necessary in preparation for death. At 6 they received the Holy Sacrament. Robinson and King wept with great bitterness as the hour of removal approached, and appeared scarcely able to contemplate the close approach of death. Boyce, Nicholls, and the boy Goulby, were more collected, particularly Boyce, whose courage never forsook him. The Rev. Mr. Cotton read portions of Scripture to them, and gave out such psalms as were best suited to their situation.

Mr. Sheriff Farebrother, and Mr. Sheriff Winchester, their under Sheriff, and four of their officers, with black wands, arrived a few minutes before eight o'clock, and proceeded direct to the Press-room, where the unhappy Hayes stood praying with clasped hands. He was dressed in white trowsers, and a short velveteen Jacket ; his demeanor was marked by composure and serenity. While the officers were pinioning his arms and wrists, he raised his hands repeatedly, and exclaimed, "Oh, God be merciful to me a sinner," "Lord look down upon me." When pinioned, he requested a handkerchief might be tied over his eyes when on the scaffold, which request was complied with. He sat and prayed with great fervour, for several minutes, and, indeed, until he was struggling in death, his lips moved with unceasing ejaculation of prayer. As the chimes were striking the hour of eight, the walls resounded with the voices of the unfortunate men singing a penitential psalm ; when this was concluded, King was brought into the room ; he appeared quite subdued and resigned, and merely said "I am happy."—
