

"Another child of sorrow will present herself to you. During this long sad night, in which my soul has been departing from its God, the inhabitant of the next world has delayed its flight; her voice reached me midst the darkness of the night, and, by some indescribable power, stayed my spirit, and keep my languid limbs from falling!"

The person to whom this was addressed, turned towards the nurse for information.
He could learn was, that by her patient's side she had been several times in the adjacent room, to offer consolation and assistance to a person who seemed resolved to desert of neither. "But you perhaps, sir," said she, "may be able to speak comfort to the poor thing."

A voice now issued from the apartment; the parition was so thin, and its apertures so frequent, that every word was distinctly heard. "Whoever you are," said the voice, "come and receive my sad tale.
I have yet breath to utter it—in a few moments my lips will close for ever!" This was articulated in a tone so faint, that there could be no doubt that the person who uttered it was indeed expiring, and the two friends, in awful silence, entered her apartment.
