THE PAST—THE PRESENT—AND THE FUTURE.

"As I was thus urged, the spectre—nothing gradually assumed a more palpable outline; and after a space, I could perceive that in as far as shadow can resemble substance—as nothing can resemble something—it bore the likeness of a man whose form had been bent by the cares, and whose locks had been bleached by the storms of ten thousand ages. Hoary wings were folded behind him; his beard of snow descended to his girdle; the emblem of eternity was under his feet: weapons of revere and desolation were around him. Near him lay a heap of crumbling bones, tattered crowns, broken sceptres, and all manner of forms and fancies of the insignia of human greatness. He ever and anon laid his withered hand on these. In his grasp they mouldered into powder; and that powder he cast, with most stoical indifference, upon the shadow of a black river which crept dimly at his feet, and slid, I know not how, into the nothingness of the surrounding space."—A Dream in Westminster Abbey.

While years roll by in solemn admonition to the travellers on Life's journey, it is frequently a source of much important gain, to devote occasionally some portion of our leisure moments to calm reflection upon the late transactions of our lives; and the various events which have been recorded in the Book of Time, although, perhaps, no longer any thing to us, than, as it were, the faint recollections of a Drama, either beautiful or deformed, according to the nature of the characters by which it was sustained. Retrospective thought was doubtless given to us, that by revolving in our minds the experience of the past, we might the better be enabled to draw up more perfect rules for the future; and also, that by imbibing a fixed hatred for the bad, from the evil and debasing impressions we have seen it produce, we likewise might become more qualified to appreciate the good, and with determination to frame our lives accordingly.

Time, then, with his "light footfall,"—noiseless as the Sleeper's Dream—having just brought us to the threshold of another year; let us not—while we enjoy the present, and are, perhaps, indulging in fond anticipations of the future—forget the moral lesson of the past; nor be unmindful of the gracious benefits we have received at the Bountiful Hand of an All-Merciful Creator:—But rather, let us turn our meditations towards the best and most effectual improvement of the days and years which we may yet be permitted to call our own, by an undeviating conformity to the true principles of honor, patriotism, industry and perseverance; and a manly resistance of every impulse to sluggishness, imbecility and crime.

In taking a brief survey, in due order of circumstances, of the ever politic Field of Improvement; the HUMAN MIND—for its peculiar and heavenly faculties—its claims our especial attention; as it demands the most assiduous and watchful cultivation. By its rich and abundant fountains to those who have justly appreciated the insupportable Gift, it holds out the most flattering inducements to exercise it continually in virtue and usefulness; not merely as regards the self gratification which the studiously disposed never fail to enjoy; but for the nobler advantages it imparts, of diffusing knowledge amongst our fellow creatures. The precious Boon, thus cultivated and matured, forms a most striking contrast with the latent hid in the earth; and is, one would imagine, a sufficient Reproof to the indolent and careless, to rouse them from their corroding slumbers.

Next to the great blessings which constantly attend the course of intellectual Improvement, succeeds the prosperity of our Agricultural and Commercial affairs...subjects so intimately connected with and dependent upon each other in every infant Settlement, that any attempt to separate the two important members, will seldom fail to weaken, if not endanger, the constitution of the body itself.—On this point, however, the past hath left us a sufficient warning.

As regards our Agricultural pursuits it is very gratifying to have grounds now for predicting the most flattering consummation, in process of time, of the well known, strenuous, and indefatigable exertions of the August Person who presides over us...who governs with so faithful and paternal a regard for the best and most lasting interests of the inhabitants generally, that it would betray an evident want of gratitude, in every particular allusion to those subjects on which the prosperity and independence of this rich Colony depends, not to express our unfeigned sense of the many obligations we know that we are under to His Excellency's Administration. But lest any thing we might presume to say, should, contrary to our wishes, invalidate the just and honourable acknowledgments which are better and more ably expressed in other parts of the Province; we will add nothing at present but our fervent hope, that His Excellency, His amiable Lady, and Family, may, under the Divine Blessing, be speedily restored to the enjoyment of perfect health, and unite again in diffusing joy and happiness around that Circle, which sincerely deplores the trying and alarming illness under which they have, for so many weeks past, been suffering.

In the Agricultural Reports for the last year, the failure of the wheat crops constitutes, perhaps, a material loss to many of our industrious farmers; but then, the singular discovery, or more particularly attention to the valuable quality and importance of the TEA WHEAT, certainly presented a most encouraging assurance of an ample return in the coming season for the deficiencies experienced in the past:—And of that particular kind of grain we have had the opportunity of seeing and judging for ourselves, and have no hesitation in saying that the beautiful appearance of the untinted complexion of it, generally, fully justified the opinion we had previously advanced. When, therefore, it is also considered, that all the other crops, with, probably, some slight exceptions, yielded an abundance; the farmers have certainly great cause to be thankful. We cannot quit this subject without offering our tribute of approbation to that Agricultural spirit which now at length prevails throughout the various districts of this Province: the minds of the farmers, in general, seem to be expanding before a proper sense of the important purposes of their industry. May they continue thus to fulfil the moral as well as religious obligations they are under, by "tilling the earth and subduing it;" and after a season in the refreshing seasons of repose from their exertions, may they look back with satisfaction on the results of their prudent industry, impressed with the delightful consciousness of having done their duty, and thus sit down—in the sober and lasting enjoyment of the well earned fruits of their labours.
