IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS, APRIL 17.

A large number of petitions were presented, praying for June next, to deliver to us, or some or one of us, as aforesaid, the repeal of the Sacramental Test, and a few against it. Of the

> The order of the day being for the second reading of the Tests and Corporation Acts Repeal bill, Lord HOLLAND addressed the House at much length, and with great ability in substance, that he had no hesitation in declaring that he tion of their enactment. Their Lordships had learned that felt bound to give his vote for the repeal of an Act which though this measure was at first manfully opposed in the has led in too many instances, to the profanation of our holy other House, yet those who apposed it ultimately acreligion; and that he considered religious tests imposed for quiesced in it.—But though there may be some elsewhere political purposes as in their nature calculated to endanger who thought it consistent with their own interests to give up religion, and that nothing but paramount necessity-a neces- the interests of the State, and that against their own opinions, sity nothing short of danger to the State—could justify their and in compliance with the opinions of a majority, that was imposition; and that such necessity, he added, no longer no reason why he (Lord Eldon) should yield up his opinion

It was against last year—last of all that such a Bill as that proposed should one of us as aforesaid, their respective accounts and documents against such, and not against those who from conscience differed ever be received in their Lordships' House, even under the the said John Gillan, in order that right and justice may be from the doctrines of the established Church, that he wished idea of amendment. He then examined the Bill, and comdone agreeably to the said Acts of the General Assembly in such to guard, that System of unbelief which was subversive of all mented with severity on some of its parts; and on the bold religion, struck at the root of judicial testimony, shook all language of the petitions presented in its favor. confidence in human veracity, and inevitably led to that The DUKE OF WELLINGTON said, he should not have reasonably and justly excluded from the possession of political power; and after some remarks on the tenets held by such as conscientiously considered themselves bound to subvert the Established Religion; on the existence of the greater danger from such as were conscientiously Dissenters; and that a religious test with them would be a stronger security than any other; he added, that he did not mean to say, that prorogued to Tuesday the seventeenth instant: I have thought fit further to prorogue the said General Assembly, further require all persons whatever, having the charge, the taking of the Sacrament ought to constitute that test; and the same is hereby prorogued to the third Tuesday in Sep- care, custody, or possession of any goods, chattels, or effects on the contrary, he held that the participation of that solemn ordinance ought not to be profuned to a pathway for secular advancement, and that the sacrament out not to be taken at all, unless through a pure religious feeling. After some fur-Lord one thousand eight hundred and do also require all the Creditors of the said Isaac Smith, on their remarks, His Lordship concluded as follows: I must say, then, my Lords, that in my opinion these laws, as acts. of exclusion, cannot be any longer maintained. [Cheering.] And though I think the declaration, proposed as a substitute in order that right and justice may be done agreeably to the in the bill, affords no defence against the real danger. I have no objection to accept it, as I consider it as good as laws which were never executed. The Church of England wants no such defence, my Lords, as these laws could give her. The defence of the Church consists in the respect and affection our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty of the People. [Loud cheering.] I admit, my Lords, that the Church may derive much benefit from Legislative measures; but then, it is only by restrictive laws against the privileges of the subject; but by amending the practical discipline of the Church, and by rendering less indirect and circuitous the administration of her own ordinances.

The BISHOP OF DURHAM had, he said, come to the conviction, that the measure under consideration might be acceded to with credit, as well as with safety to the Established Church. It was for the interest of our Institutions,with the interest of the Dissenters themselves, -- to support the existing Church, and to uphold it in the public estimation. He knew and felt how much the Country was indebted to that body in its literature, in its arts, and sciences, and he might say, in religion itself; and he knew, that except when former, the Marquis of Lansdowne presented no less than they were under the influence of agitators, unlike themselves, they were favourably disposed to the Protestant Church, as a part of the Constitution of the Country, and disposed to support its authority.

Lord ELDON opposed the bill at some length. It gave him, he said, satisfaction to think, that in opposing the re-The ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, in a short speech, said, peal of the Test Acts, he was supporting the original intenexists. At the same time he had, he said, a right to expect, to the majority of the House of Parliament; on the contrary, that something shall be substituted for this test. ... he felt it to be his duty to act upon his own conscientious course of measures which plunged France in confusion and troubled their Lordships with his opinions in this stage of the blood. He called, then, on the Reverend Bench to take proceedings, had it not been for the statements of the Noble care that the House should have some security against these and Learned Lord who had just sat down.
