

[FROM THE NATIONAL GAZETTE.]

Extract of a letter from an American gentleman, dated Gibraltar, 14th September, 1828.

"The fever has increased rapidly, is pervading all parts of the town, and has become very fatal. About 5000 of the poorer inhabitants and 1200 troops have been sent out of the town, to an encampment on the neutral ground, and another regiment is to go as soon as arrangements can be made. Nearly all the better class of inhabitants have fled. The disease is of the same type as in 1813 and 1814, when 130 died per day, and upwards of 15,000 were buried. The alarm is appalling. The Spaniards have placed a cordon round the bay and across the neutral ground, which it is certain death to attempt to evade or break. They allow no communication whatever, and all the ports in the neighbourhood are closed—no vessel from this place being allowed to enter, even to speak or obtain provisions or water. The only refuge is on ship board in the bay, &c. &c."
