LIFE, LIKE A RIVER.

I stood by the side of a gentle rill,
Which burst from the brow of a woody hill,
And it bubbled and flashed in the sunny ray,
Like the merry laugh of a child at play.

DOMESTIC POSITION AND PROSPECTS.

The advantages of social life in a Christian country like Britain, are so manifest and manifold, that he who refuses to aid in their perpetuation must have a cold heart, or a unreflecting mind, even if a selfish principle did not govern his will; but when we consider this comparatively small island as the centre of a vast system—extending political liberty—diffusing commercial opulence, and imparting the light of truth into every known portion of the earth, the most thoughtful will admit the importance of a due consideration of our domestic and foreign state, with reference to our present condition and future prospects.

England appears to be entering on a new epoch, of a higher and holier aspect than any which she has before witnessed. Many things combine to favour this idea;—the peculiar state of Europe, nay, of every known part of the world; the change of feeling everywhere perceptible; a transition state around, consequent on the sloughing of old prejudices, and the growth of new and more expansive principles, adapted to the increasing intelligence and extending communication between different and distant parts of the globe; a competitive spirit has arisen in commerce, politics, and science; and the desire for investigation into everything has led to a more minute and searching inquiry into the responsible duties of life.

The immense power and resources of this country involve, however, a corresponding responsibility; for nations are as amenable for the misuse or neglect of talents conferred as individuals. Blessed with peace at home, and with extraordinary energy, talent and patriotism, evinced in various countries; possessed of abundance of the elements of wealth, in the hands of an industrious, obedient, and intelligent people; holding communications with, or occupying portions of, almost every part of the habitable globe, it becomes a solemn duty to investigate our position—and not be content at being hurried with tremendous velocity along, as it were, an inclined plane—careless whether we are going, and regardless of individual or national self-preservation.

Peace, that essential blessing in domestic life, extends throughout the United Kingdom; party spirit is fast subsiding; the political constitution may be considered as settled for many years to come; and public liberty and personal security are established on the broad basis of popular rights, vigilantly watched over by a national representative assembly, aided by an ever-active, honest, and intelligent periodical "Press." Freed from the distracting strife, consequent on the frequent and elective change of the head of the state, and firmly attached, on principle, to the hereditary monarchical rule, we have reason to rejoice that a youthful sovereign and her amiable consort have a fair prospect of lengthened life, with the advantage of a direct succession to the throne of these realms.

Government, we think we may look forward to continued peace, and to an undivided attention, on the part of our rulers, to objects of momentous interest, which have hitherto escaped general attention.

RELIGION.—The sacred functions of religion are sedulously attended to; the ministers of the National Church Establishment have learned, by dear-bought experience, that dissent has had its main origin in the neglect of pastoral duties, and that flocks may even be restored to once deserted folds by attention to those holy rites which every rightly constructed mind delights in fulfilling. The act for the commutation of tithes has removed all cause of contention between an Episcopalian and those who are obliged to maintain them; and the connexion between the endowed Church and the State is perfectly secure. The schism which for a time threatened with ruin the Kirk of Scotland has subsided, and the friends of that excellent hierarchy will derive wisdom from the recent transactions; and, in the exercise of their patronage, will deem it their duty to consult the inclinations of the parishioners with reference to the qualifications of those to whom spiritual duties are entrusted. In Ireland, the baneful discord of religious antipathy has, to a large extent, diminished; the Roman Catholic is now placed on the same political level as his Protestant fellow citizen; and, were it not for the exciting causes arising from the peculiar position of an egyptomyriar priesthood, there would be a perfect absence of sectarian feuds in the sister island.

EDUCATION is making rapid progress in England, Scotland, and Ireland—in the latter more particularly, under the auspices of government; in England, partly by the aid of pecuniary grants, but mainly by the means of the people themselves; and in Scotland, chiefly by those admirable parochial institutions which have given to Scotchmen wealth and reputation in every quarter of the globe. If attention be paid to the education of the heart as well as of the head, we have no fear as to the result—although the inevitable tendency of diffusing instruction and information is to bring all men nearer to one common level, unless the higher classes of society maintain an advanced position before those who are rapidly treading in their footsteps.

SOCIAL RELATIONS.—Herein, too, we see improvement: the ordinary wants of life are better supplied, and its daily necessities are multiplied or cheapened, so as to bring them within the means of the mass of the community; men are learning the value of combinative power to effect great ends—companies are being formed for various useful purposes—the competitive principle calls forth the renewed energy, and a development of individual resources for the public weal—and the free expansion of mind, regulated by a just principle, is capable of producing immense good. Science and capital have combined with industry for the adaptation of the novel element of steam power to the various purposes of life; and by means of rail-roads all over the kingdom, we derive a still greater concentration of national power than even our compact insular situation heretofore gave us.

The close approximation of town to town has quickened the stream of life, and, while giving a more active vitality to thought, has stimulated the entire nation, and given an onward movement to public spirit and private enterprise. Let us not, however, blind ourselves to the certain results of this impulsive action; its effects are beginning to be seen and felt, in the upheavings of the lower strata of society. When all are advancing and improving, it would be irrational to expect quiescence among those whose sole support is their daily labour, and who, with increasing intelligence, augmenting wants, and a rapid perception of their importance in the social fabric, find no corresponding advance in their physical and political position; but on this subject it is not necessary for us here to enter.

COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL.—In those departments there is much to be done, requiring prudence, foresight, and a due regard to our complex and anomalous position. We want trade to be freed from all unnecessary imposts, divested of shackles, and, as far as possible, made as free as the wind that blows around our island. A revision of our commercial tariff is imperatively required, and to the accomplishment of this useful purpose our best energies shall be devoted. Inland traffic is rapidly augmenting, and Ireland especially is advancing with great strides in mercantile activity. The finances of England are interwoven with her mercantile transactions; but in several particulars, as we have in previous numbers indicated, reforms may be made in our fiscal system. The joint-stock principle of banking requires especial and minute examination and regulation, with a view to prevent an engine of great utility becoming a source of evil, and widespread mischief.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE MR. FORBES, OF CULLODEN.—FEUDAL INCIDENT.—The remains of Duncan George Forbes, Esq., of Culloden, were interred in the family burying-ground, in the Chapel-yard, Inverness, on Saturday last. The late Culloden had died somewhat suddenly and unexpectedly, in his 60th year; he had long been withdrawn from public view, in consequence of circumstances which depressed this once influential family; but the reverence entertained by our countrymen for the head of an ancient house, was revived on this melancholy occasion, and drew crowds of sympathizing spectators to witness the obsequies of the departed. Unfortunately, this funeral was marked by what we must be allowed to call a barbarous relic of feudal manners. For upwards of a century there has existed a feud between the men of Ferrintosh (part of the estate of the deceased) and the men of Culloden, as to which was entitled to carry the body of the Laird, or surround the hearse in its progress to the grave. At the funeral of the former Culloden, father of the late Laird, the Ferrintosh men obtained the precedence, and they insisted on retaining it also on this occasion. When the procession had gone about half a mile on the road, part of the Culloden people, stung with this supposed affront, and perhaps partially inflamed with ardent spirits, entered the wood by the roadside and armed themselves with sticks, with which they sallied forth to attack their opponents and drive them from the hearse. Some severe blows were interchanged; and a few of them were cut on the head and across the face, while others were knocked down and lay insensible on the road. The Culloden people were enforced by a band of idle young men from the town, who had been previously connected with the district, and thus strengthened, the party succeeded in driving back the main body of their opponents. A few of the Ferrintosh men, however, held fast by the hearse, in spite of every opposition, and never relinquished their hold till the procession had arrived at the burial place. After a pause, the attack was renewed on the road, and continued for some time with equal violence. Mr. John Macbean, messenger-at-arms, (a most useful and valuable public officer,) interposed to quell the unseemly disturbance; and partly by holding back and dividing the men, and partly by appealing to their better feelings, he succeeded in restoring peace and order. It was feared that the contest would be repeated in the Chapel-yard, where the crowd was so dense as scarcely to admit of passage for the coffin; but the excellent arrangements which were adopted, and the exertions of Mr. Macbean and the superintendent of police, prevented such a deplorable result. The gentlemen of the district, and the respectable tenants on each side, carried the coffin, while the men from the country walked beside them. The whole of the surrounding walls, tombs, and monuments in the Chapel-yard were covered with spectators, forming a novel and impressive spectacle. The utmost silence prevailed while the body was carried over the graves to the eastern extremity of the Chapel-yard, and committed to its "narrow house."—Inverness Herald.
