

not approve in his conduct of our Foreign Relations. On these subjects, the general tone and character of the Executive messages to Congress, and other public communications, have been patriotic, dignified, and well considered. We might add, too, that looking to some of the principal missions abroad, we do not know when they have been filled—certainly not for a long time past—by incumbents more useful and honorable to the nation. We most sincerely hope that the Administration may enjoy the enviable distinction of putting at rest difficulties which have so long existed, and which at times seemed to threaten the general peace.

The Commissioners to arrange for a conventional line, were, on the part of Maine, Edward Kavanagh, Edward Kent, N. P. Preble, and John Otis; and on the part of Massachusetts, Abbott Lawrence, John Mills, and Charles Allen. These most respectable gentlemen, high in the confidence of their respective States, appointed without reference to political parties, and confined to none, will, we are convinced, be found to have executed the trust reposed in them in the most desirable and honorable manner.

We know nothing of the particular proceedings which have taken place in this negotiation since the publication of the letter of the Secretary of State to the Governors of Maine and Massachusetts, in May last. The business, as we then felt and said, was well begun, though we hesitated to indulge in any very sanguine hopes of bringing so many different interests to agree. That they have agreed, is creditable alike to the patriotism and good sense of all parties.

The States interested deserve eminent commendation for the manner in which they appointed and gave full powers to their Commissioners, as well as for the selection of individuals so fitted for their high trust.

And, while giving due credit to all who have been instrumental in bringing about the happy result which we took up our pen to announce, we must not pass by him who, it is to be presumed, guided and was the chief counsellor in the negotiation. We mean of course the Secretary of State. The task which devolved upon him was a most difficult one. The courage arising from a high sense of duty was necessary to embolden him to attempt what so many had failed in; and prudence, wise conduct, and firm determination must have been requisite to success. We are greatly deceived in our judgment and our information in this matter, if, when the history of this negotiation is published, the Secretary do not have this praise awarded him by the unanimous public voice.

In conclusion, we congratulate the British Envoy upon the honorable result of his difficult mission, which cannot but confirm to him the respect and regard that his urbanity and acceptable deportment have won from all who have had occasion to know him.

* * From the general anxiety which is everywhere felt respecting the negotiations on the Boundary question, we have copied the latest information which has reached us from Washington, and although we cannot present our readers with any thing official on this important subject, yet we have the satisfaction to say that private letters from Washington have been received in town, stating that the settlement of the Boundary Question had been agreed on between Lord Ashburton and the American Government, on terms which the Commissioners of Massachusetts and Maine had subscribed to, and these terms would probably be known by Monday last, and would only then await the confirmation of the Senate.
