

order; and considering the influence he must everywhere exert on the minds and dispositions of the young, it is not surprising that Christian Governments should have become aware that the superintendence and training of those on whom such important duties devolve, are amongst the highest and most sacred of their obligations.

I do not propose on this occasion to point out any objects for your immediate attention, beyond those to which I formerly adverted. I would still urge on you the cultivation of all those sciences, the practical application of which may contribute to the prosperity of a new country; the characteristics of which should be a vigilant attention to the spirit of improvement in more advanced communities, and an aptitude in seizing and applying whatever may be found to be adapted to its situation. When we reflect how early the Grecian Colonies became celebrated, and how great was the fame they acquired from such men as Archimedes and Euclid, we are encouraged to look for those efforts which in time may impart to our own Colonies the like distinction; and let me indulge a hope, that with the example of England before you, and fortified by those Christian principles which are the foundation of all honourable exertions, this College may become the means of acquiring to New Brunswick a title to general estimation in the enlightened portions of the world; and be enabled to reciprocate those benefits, which the labours of other minds have so largely imparted to ourselves.

I must not omit to express my acknowledgments to the Professors for their zealous exertions during the last Academical year, and also to the Masters of the Grammar School, as evidenced at the recent Examinations.

I propose for the Douglas Medal of the ensuing year, the following subject, to be open to general competition:—"The Improvements which have been recently effected in the science of Elementary Instruction." The unappropriated Medal of last year is again offered on the terms then proposed, and for an Essay on the same subject.
