

communication with the Hospital. At one time, the only two nurses we had, were laid up, (one of them died from fever,) and, during their illness, the whole of the duties devolved upon one or two patients who were just recovering. At present, there is only one attendant for the whole; and it is obvious that much more good might be done if the cleansing and washing departments were more efficient. The supply of wholesome food, wine and medicine, has been ample; but it would lead very much to the improvement of the poor sufferers, were there a better provision for the more frequent change of bedding and linen.

There is a total want of water on the premises: and in every point of view it would be advisable to sink a proper well in the immediate vicinity.

As to your question respecting the best means of preventing the spread of the disease in this community, it is obvious that apart from the influence of contagion, the first principle is, to insist upon the strictest cleanliness in all those portions of the City which are liable to become crowded by the poor; and, if possible, the early removal of fever cases occurring under circumstances likely to aggravate the disorder or endanger the public health.

It is difficult to account wholly for the spread of this Fever in Fredericton, without supposing that there has been a want of a proper system at the Ports, as many of the Emigrants arrive here with the disease fully developed.

The sanitary establishments at the Out-Ports ought to be in a position to retain, under Medical surveillance, those Emigrants who have not quite rallied from the effects of the disease, or those in whom a process of acclimatization seems to be going on.

Another question to which our attention is directed, relates to the means to be employed on the passage to the Colony, whereupon we may observe—

1st. That all persons offering themselves as Passengers ought to be certified to be free from any contagious disorder, and that they have not immediately left any infected district where fever of a bad character, small pox, &c., had been raging.

2d. That much greater strictness should be used by the officers acting under the Customs and Emigration Acts, to see that the provisions of the said Acts are complied with to the letter; especially as concerns the quality and quantity of the food and water of the ship, and the number of passengers permitted in proportion to each ship's tonnage.

The appointment of a Surgeon to ships carrying Emigrants, would be conducive to most beneficial results; and we are of opinion, that in all cases, ships sailing to these Provinces should be compelled each to carry a Medical Officer, when the number of souls on board exceed fifty.

We have the honor to be, &c.
