

Under any circumstances, thirty one years, the time which has passed since my first appointment to the Bench, is a long judicial life; you know that in my case the labours have never been light, and of late, with the growth of the country, have become more and more arduous; but they have been attended with this happy alleviation, that the utmost harmony and mutual confidence have generally prevailed among the Judges, to which the high character and eminent qualities of no one have more conduced than those of my immediate predecessor, Sir James Carter, who, after a service contemporaneous with my own, has retired in the full enjoyment of the respect and regard of his brother Judges, of you, Gentlemen of the Bar, and the whole community; and to whom I sincerely trust Providence may yet vouchsafe many years of health and comfort, and not unmerited nor unuseful leisure.

Permit me, as a last word, to say, Gentlemen, that I trust we may be all guided by a desire to maintain, unimpaired, the good feeling and confidence which it is so essential to the due administration of justice in British Courts should exist between the Judges and the Bar, and which the controversies and conflicts, sometimes unavoidable, ought not to be allowed to disturb. Let us always bear in mind the account we are hereafter to give of the talents committed to us, not for our own benefit, but for the welfare of others, and seek for light and wisdom to that only source from which all our blessings flow.

Extract from the Minutes.
