Fredericton, 21st Sept. 1830.

To the Electors of the County of York.

GENTLEMEN,

WHEN I had the honor of addressing you, at the close of the last General Election, it was with a full determination, of not again offiering myself as a Candidate for your suffrages; under the impression, (from the result of that contest,) that it was not the wish of the majority of the Electors, that I should represent the County, in our Provincial Parliament; and while I remained under that impression, nothing should have induced me, to come forward a second [timehaving no wish to force myself upon you. But having been informed, from various parts of the County, that it is now the general wish, that I should be chosen as one of your Representatives, I am induced to offer again-at the same time in doing so, I stand upon those strict constitutional principles, which prevent my personally soliciting a vote from any one. I have no selfish object to gain, in getting a seat in the House of Assembly. On the contrary, I know, I must, in going there, devote so much of my time to the public service, as to cause serious loss and inconvenience to my-The following communication from the Earl of Aber- self. You must not therefore suppose my not canvassing for your votes arises from any want of respect for you, but from a conviction in my own mind, that the means, too generally resorted to, to obtain votes at an election, are highly unconstitutional, inconsistent with the true freedom of election, and as degrading to the electors to submit to, as they are to the candidate who practices them; added to which, many of you must have often enough experienced, that the promises and plausible professions of civility and friendship you generally receive at elections, are merely for the purpose of the present, calculated only to deceive, and lasting no longer than till the vote is obtained; and I trust you have all too much good feeling and sound sense to think the worse
