Pasticulars of the suicide of Lieut. Co. Brerelon The report of this tragical erent, as we have already stated, reached Bristol about nine o'cleck this morning. and, as may be imagined, it created an indiscribable sensation throughout the city. It took place at Redford Lodge, Lawrence hill, an exceedingly neat and pret ty cottage, the resident of the unfortunate deceased, and situated about a mile and a half from Bristol on the upper Bath road not be fair to make public any thing Venerable Archdeacon Coster, Colonel Brereton, it appears, returned written under circumstances which must The Hon. He came home in his gig, accompanied by his gardener .his domestics in his manner or deportment ry point of view; and he could not comon the occasion. He retired to his bed plain of injustice or severity in the prosecoamber some time after 12 o'clock; but he must have remained up a considerable time in committing to writing the reasons which had induced him to perpetrate the fatal deed, for he left after him on the table a statement on the subject, that occupied nearly half a quire of paper. His pistols had been as usual deposited on the table in his bed room. He did not undress himself, but merely took off his coat and threw himself on the bed.

About a quarter before three o'clock the house keeper, hearing the report of a pistol in Colonel Brereton's bed room, gave the alarm and the Colonel's footman immediately proceeded thither. He there found his unfortunate master stretched on his bed, and life completely extinct.
