THE HEROES

IN that Valhalla where the heroes go A careful sentinel paced to and fro Before the gate, burnt black with battle smoke, Whose echoes to the tread of armed men woke,
And up the fiery stairs whose steps are none, Came the pale heroes of the bloodstained years There lean Caesars from the glory fields With heart that only to a sword-thrust yields And there were Generals dead in prime of rank, Red scabbard swinging from the worn sword hilt, And slender youths, who were the sons of kings, And barons with their sixteen quarters.
The courteous feudal gentlemen, who gave their
And to each came, justly he owed His string of titles, as he passed inside.
And presently there was a little man, A silent tower in the regal van,
His hand still grasped his rifle, and his eyes Seemed blinded with the light from Paradise.
He was a humble guise, a modest air, The gentle old man shrilly, "Who goes there?"
There were no words said to that simple man, But every noble heart beat out its flame,
And every blue-blooded warrior bowed his head,
"I am a Belgian," this was all he said.
Men's cheering echoed thro' the battle's Hall "Pass in, mon brave," said that who was sent Brisbane, Queensland.

M. Forrest in The Spectator

OUT OF THE FASHION

HOW shall I tell her? the man said To himself, on his way homeward.
How the devil shall I tell her?
He reached his home at Tuinell Park, as usual, and found the customary quietude, the familiar atmosphere of well-being, of security, of order. There would be guests at dinner this evening; he must keep up his countenance till he and Mary were alone and at the head of the stairs, he would smile, his silence, that was altruistic. He asked after the baby, and received a word or two of satisfactory information. Then Mary smiled again, and passed on to dress for dinner.
It was a pleasant evening, and such as they often enjoyed. Only two friends, people of their own standing, well-to-do, but unpretentious. Mary's music, always a great resource; her husband's thoroughly good-natured, far from brilliant, talk.
No naggingness, no play. Mary knew how to manage these things. Then they were alone, and the night before him.
Mary, there's bad news. I may as well out with it at once; but it's the hardest job I ever had in my life.
No exclamation. She stood, with nerves tense and looked steadily at him. As surely it was not a pleasant thing to make known. Appointed, a year and a half ago, manager of a department in a great house of business, Claxton had fallen short of the expectations of the firm. The appointment to begin with, had seemed as much as it delighted him; he knew that he would be to personal favour; the head of the firm, an amiable old gentleman, friendly to him since his childhood, had given him this great chance. And for a time, unusually, Claxton seemed to flourish; the demands upon him. He was an excellent man; the advancement had enabled him to marry; great happiness lifted him above misery. But his old patron very soon died, and Claxton became aware that the new order of things was not quite favourable to him. Month after month he had struggled hard, allowing no one to suspect his mortifications and his fears.
Now the blow had fallen. He was under notice to resign his position, and—what would become of him?
He told it in a few shamefaced words, the mere humiliating truth; to his wife he could not do otherwise. And Mary drew a sigh of relief.
"Oh, I thought from your face, it was something dreadful!"
"And don't you think it so?"
"It's very hard for you, dear." There was silence. Then they talked things over as quietly as they could, for many days the conversation was resumed, always cheerfully on Mary's part, until at length a resolve had been taken.
The Claxtons left London, and began a new life in a Northern town. Mary had a much smaller house, and she was not to do it. Her second child was born. Happily, she had not been brought up in the world of limitless leisure; she was not very highly educated, though her intelligence made her seem superior to that respect to her husband's work, and became necessary to lay aside, books and music, and to do much of the work which servants had hitherto done for her, the spirit was willing and the flesh did not rebel. Her smile told the old, quiet, cheerfulness; her words—weighty and calm—were—had all the old, quiet, cheerfulness.

Then Claxton received at the hands of distress his second chance. He was engaged, and encouraged by Mary, to begin business on his own account. He looked up once more, recovered the note of hopefulness. When a third child was born to him, he felt justified in removing to a better house. And Mary's music presently sounded again.
But in secret he could not trust himself, and, as time went on, he had more and more reason for the heavy countenance, the long dark broodings, which he carefully concealed from his wife. Upon fear followed passion; then came the second, the more grievous downfall.

Again in a strange place, and in poorer circumstances than she had ever known, she shed about her the light of hope.
She had now to bring up her children in the poverty of the future. The father might do his best, to earn their livelihood; upon the mother lay a more difficult duty. Hers to guard them from the degrading effects of manifest poverty; to foster, by ceaseless thought and imaginative effort, the self-respect of the little ones; to hold their minds above the slough of base necessity; to supply from the riches of her own mind so much that the world denied. The help of one servant often enough hindered rather than helped;—near all she could not afford. Her strength failed not; but it was more severely tried than her husband ever imagined. No merry holidays no social recreation; once a year, at most, the brief change of air without which her children could hardly live. Work of the hardest, the most exhausting to mind and body, from early morning till late evening was her lot. Her husband came home. But man cannot live by bread alone; not here to be followed by the children, who had their hour of mental rest. She could not play to him—there was no piano; but sometimes she sang, keeping her voice very low and soft, that the sleeping children might not be disturbed.

She bore another child, but it only knows on the subject of compulsion. Mary lay in the valley of the deep shadow, and for many days her husband was chill with fear. Once again he was told by his wife that she was not only for her own comfort, but for the sake of the children, he must resign his position, and—what would become of him?

It passed. Mary again moved about the house, shedding the light of hope.

MR. LINCOLN AND COMPULSION

WHILE dealing with the question of compulsion we cannot do better than quote one of our own countrymen, the very able and wise Mr. Lincoln, who, in his address to the House of Commons on the subject of compulsion, said: "The subject of compulsion is a
