PROGRESS OF THE WAR

[October 19 to October 25]

DURING the week under review the fortunes of war fluctuated greatly, and the net result, all fronts considered, was apparently in favor of the Central Powers.

In the Western campaign both the British and the French made further substantial advances in Picardy, the one towards Bapaume and the other towards Péronne. The event of the week, however, was the great success of the French north of Verdun, where they advanced beyond the Thiaumont work and captured Douaumont village and fort. The ground taken was strongly held in spite of fierce German counterattacks; and the French took over 5,000 prisoners and much military stores and munitions. No notable change was effected at any other part of the Western front, though at many points much activity prevailed.

In the Eastern campaign the Russians do not seem to have scored any notable success at any point, though fierce fighting took place west of Lutsk in Volhynia, and northeast and southeast of Lemberg in Galicia, the vicinity of Halicz being the scene of the most desperate struggle. Further south, in Bukowina and Transylvania, where the Russians and Rumanians have joined forces, they had to retire at several points. Along the Transylvanian Alps the Rumanians barely held their own. Altogether, while the week on this front did not bring much success to the Russians and Rumanians, it did not bring them any serious disaster.

No important event was reported in the Caucasian campaign, though the Russians appear to have made a slight further advance west of Trebizond; and in Persia they were said to have scored a minor success.

Nothing was reported concerning the campaign in Mesopotamia; and in the Egyptian campaign the British made a successful raid on a Turkish outpost some distance to the east of Ismailia on the Suez Canal, and another on hostile tribes in the west, on the border of the Sahara Desert. No news was received of the campaign in East Africa.

The Balkan campaign yielded further successes for the Entente Allies in Serbia and Macedonia; but in the Dobrudja province of Rumania the Russians and Rumanians had to retire before superior forces of Teutons, Turks, and Bulgars under Von Mackensen, who occupied the Black Sea port of Constanza and the railway running from it to the Danube. The Rumanians, with whom are now many Russians, had a hard week of it all round; but the reports state that they are not downhearted, and they are certainly not defeated.

Hampered by unfavorable weather conditions the Italian campaign did not make much progress, but the Italians were able to score some successes in Trentino and in the Carso.

The week was marked by innumerable air raids, the most notable of which was one by the Entente Allies on Metz, where tons of bombs were dropped on German military works. A raid by a German seaplane on Margate, in Kent, resulted in some injury to a few people, and some material damage of no great consequence.

Submarine activity was perhaps greater than in any preceeding week of the war, as is shown in "News of the Sea," where are recorded all the disasters caused by submarines reported during the week in the Canadian daily press. As the Presidential election is now in full swing in the United States the Germans feel quite sure that the American Government will not take any action to compel Germany to keep her paction with America in regard to the conduct of submarine warfare, which Germany has so flagrantly ignored for several weeks past. After the election, whichever party wins, it is pretty certain that America will take a stand that will not be at all to the liking of Germany.

THE BUREAUCRACY

WE commend to our readers a careful perusal of the article, "The Petty Official" which we print elsewhere in this issue, from the London Spectator; and as the subject treated of therein is one that will receive much of our attention "after the war," we ask those interested in the matter to preserve the article for future reference. The article is timely and authoritative. It was inspired by a trial in London of a petty official of the Government clothing factory at Pimlico, London. The presiding Judge, Mr. Justice Low, imposed a sentence of imprisonment and the cost of the trial on the official concerned, who had accepted bribes for passing a large quantity of military trousers not up to specifications, made by outside contractors; and in passing sentence the Judge made some scathing remarks on the inefficiency of the Government's system of accounting, as well as on the conduct of the unscrupulous contractors, who ought to have been on trial but were not.

The Spectator embraces the opportunity to discuss the larger question of the growth of the bureaucracy in Great Britain, which has become "a monster of such frightful mien" that it will have to be dealt with seriously after the war.

Of all the Departments of State which must come in for after-the-war criticism, that of Foreign Affairs is likely to receive most attention; and when this is in order the BEACON may be relied upon to give some first-hand information that will place the administration of that Department in an altogether unfavorable light.

And it must be borne in mind by all careful students of the political affairs of our own great Dominion that the Bureaucracy in Canada has grown to such an extent as to "give us pause." All countries are suffering from the same cause, and in all countries the problem of how to deal with it is of such stupendous proportions that it has not been grappled with, and the menace, in consequence, steadily increases. But dealt with it must be, sooner or later, in Canada as in Great Britain; and political leaders who have the courage to attempt to rectify the great and growing evil will deserve well of their country and should reap a merited reward.

HEARD AT SEA

THE DREAMER AND THE DRUM

Drake is fighting for England again,
Pinnace and Galleon are at it amain.
In foul weather and flying scud
There's reek of powder and smell of blood.
Hear creak of yards and crack of sheet,
The patter on deck of unshod feet.
Day or night you can hear a fight;
Lie by the cliff and it's just as if
The Don and El Draque were at it amain—
It's Drake fighting for England again.

AS it is my own particular village I will not give you explicit directions how to get there, but you cannot get to it by train and the roads forbid the motor-car. It is a little half-moon village with a stone quay edging the cluster of brown houses. There are red-sailed boats and brown-faced fisher-folk. There is a miniature ale-house, the sign of the Dragon, named for El Draque or Sir Francis, whichever you please to call him. You go down into the village by a hundred steps, past drying nets and piled oars and masts from the little craft in the bay. Turn to your left and skirt the crescent until you come to where the stone quay ends and the beach begins. There is a scant hundred miles of this, and then the path rises, fringing the cliffs. Climb up and on until you get to a little green mound with a stone set atop of it. Then sit down and fill a pipe. If you do not smoke, then you will miss much, for tobacco is at its best up there in the fresh, sweet air. This is how I went to the place a few days ago.

I had not been sitting long when I heard a voice behind me and, turning, saw an oldish man standing back of the mound. He had a thin grey beard that showed up on his brown face like white orchard moss on brown apple bark. He had heavy gold earrings in his ears and he smoked a small-bowled, thin clay pipe, black and shiny, which he fondled lovingly.

"A good morning to you, sir," he said as he sat near me.

"Good morning," I said. "Are you from the village?"

"One time I was," he answered, "but I live up there away now," and he pointed to the little church which now stands alone on the down, but which was once the centre of a village like the one below. "D'ye hear it?" said the old fellow suddenly. "You can hear the roll of it. It's just as he told us 'twould be, and it means what he said, too."

"Those are the guns in France," I said, for you could hear them muttering ceaselessly over the water.

"Guns?" he said smilingly; "they're not guns. It's the drum rolling—Frankie's drum as he said it would. He's afloat again and away up Channel." He carefully knocked the ashes from his pipe and I passed him my pouch, which he had some difficulty in opening. He filled his pipe and pressed the redhot dottle from the ashes of his last fill on the top. "This is a quaint weed, surely," he said. "'Tis soft in flavor, but sweet smoking. This of mine now is not as new as it might have been once, but it was brought to this country in the Heart's Desire on her last run from Virginia. Benjamin Capel, master mariner, is as good a judge of tobacco as he is sailor or fighter. Many a packet of good brown leaf he's brought me, and once Frankie himself smoked some of it with me when he lay at the Dragon. There's the drum again! Listen to it, listen. It's a sign for all of England's enemies, but its mostly a sign for us, so I take it. That's as he meant it, I think. When we hear it we are to remember all we fight for. Some say we fight for the present, some for the years that come. Both be right, but I have a mind we fight for the past as well. It is not every nation that can say so, for many of them be upstarts. Listen here o' nights and you will hear it all. There's the sound of cannon and the crash of shot through oak timbers. I've heard it with cries of the dying and the maimed. I've passed the shot in a chain of hands from the locker to the guns. See that old iron there?—and he kicked a rib of iron in the stone slab by his feet—"that's part of the basket of Cliff Beacon that I lit with these hands night of Armada's coming. Then I got me down and joined Frankie. Yes, that's Drake, his drum sounding—there are no two ways about it. Its not the guns in France. And it means we win as Drake won."

Saying this, he turned and bade me good-bye. "What's your name?" I called after him as he went down the far slope of the mound. John Treadwell," he called back.

I got up from the mound, for it was time to go, and I thought I might as well walk back with my acquaintance. But when I went to the other side of the knoll there was no one in view, and that was strange, for the country was flat and the path stretched away towards the church.

I walked under the little lych-gate and through the churchyard. I do not know what led me aside, but I stopped to read the writing on a grey headstone:—

HERE LYES THE BODIE OF JOHNNE TREADWELL,
OF THYS PARISH,
WHO DIED ON HYS SHIPPE WHEN FIGHTING THE SPANIARD.

As I went back through the village the innkeeper greeted me. "Guns be noisy this morning, sir," he said.

"Those aren't guns," I said. "That's Drake's drum." And I left him gaping after me perplexedly as I climbed the steep stone steps.—The Times, London.

The ladies of Dukes Ward gave a very delightful knitting and thimble party on Tuesday evening, in Christ Church school room, which was kindly lent to them for that purpose by the rector, Ven. Archdeacon Newnham. There was a fine programme of music, both vocal and instrumental, and from a Victrola, also a short play called "Miss Paterson's Party to meet Lieut. Grimes," which was well done by eight young ladies. "O Canada" was sung during the play, and directly after, tea and cake was served. Before going home the National Anthem was sung. There were two hundred ladies present and nearly all were knitting socks and other useful articles for the comfort of the soldiers. The proceeds amounted to forty dollars and was given to the Red Cross Society in Town. The party was the most unique and one of the pleasantest ever given here.

ST. GEORGE, N. B.

Oct. 23.

Passengers on the N. B. Southern saw two moose, a large one and a small one, a few miles from St. George, while Wednesday's train was coming from St. John.

The heavy rains last week caused a big rise of water in the streams and the river. According to the big game experts moose and deer will now take to the high lands. A couple of hunters, a few miles from town the other morning, came on the carcas of a deer partly eaten and still warm. A short distance from the deer, a bear was seen, evidently frightened from his repast by their arrival. Bruin got away carrying one bullet in his body. The finding of the deer has given rise to considerable talk among the local sports.

Mr. and Mrs. Vail, of Brockway, are guests of Mrs. A. C. Grant.

Manager Arnold, of the Bank of Nova Scotia, is again on duty after an absence of several weeks.
