Poetry.

For the Christian Watchman:

LOVE IN OLD AGE.

When the path of life is ended,
And the moan of Acheron
With a solemn warning blended
Strikes our wasting ears upon.

When with tremulous step, and weary
Pace we near the rolling stream,
Chanting forth a "Miserere"
When its sombre waters gleam.

Oh! than in our spring time fonder,
Side by side in deathless love,
We in fond embrace shall wander—
Through the solemn Stygian grove.

Then my fond arm thee enfolding
Still shall press thee to my heart,
Me thy tender eyes beholding
Stil? shall bid my griefs depart.

Singing as we slowly wander
Where the sombre waters flow,
Time but makes our hearts grow fonder,
While each others love we know. B.

CHAPTER I.

THE LITTLE IRISH BOY.

On a beautiful Sabbath morning a gentleman left the inn at Cromarty and leisurely sauntered through the little village and the surrounding country, admiring the beauties of the lovely spot. Lofty hills, covered with groves of trees, ran continuously along, with but a single interruption, toward the sea. The valleys, clothed "with living green," such as "Erin" only can display, were dotted with the cottages of the peasantry; while on the gentle slopes, which were beautifully diversified with glades of pasture ground, and luxuriant with the richest vegetation, stood boldly in view the stately mansions of the noblemen and gentry of the country.

The plain is richly shaded with the noble oak, and a river winding through the midst of the valley waters with its silver stream the plantations of trees and the luxuriant meads which clothe its banks. There was all around an aspect of prosperity and abundance. The air was loaded with the fragrance of the spicy shamrock and innumerable flowers, which spread their beauteous carpet, variegated with rainbow hues, along the borders of the highway and lanes.

Above was the bluest of skies, where now not a cloud was visible. Toward the north, in which direction only was there a break in the surrounding hills, the land stretched away till it met the waters of the limitless ocean. At this point the landscape received its crowning glory. The wide expanse of waters, hushed to perfect rest, except as it gently surged on the shore, lay smooth and resplendent as a plain of crystal, mirroring on its glassy surface the numerous vessels which lay becalmed upon its tranquil bosom.

A few scattered rocky islands, like sea monsters, seemed rising from the deep, and around them the sea gulls were flapping their heavy wings. So still was the air that the hoarse screams of these birds, mellowed by the distance, were wafted distinctly, and not unmusically, to the ear, mingling with the melody of the song-birds on the shore.

The gentleman, who was evidently a stranger in the country, gazed about him with an expression of surprise and admiration. He seemed never tired with gazing around, looking again and again on the sea, the land, and the sky. At length he reached a turn in the road which led down into a pleasant valley, presenting a scene of such surpassing loveliness that he sat by the roadside to enjoy its beauty. In the valley was a village of about a hundred houses, so cosily connected together that the remembrance of home irresistibly rushed over the mind of the traveler. Seated thus, with half-closed eyes, he fell into a dreamy musing.

He was suddenly aroused from his revery by a sweet voice singing a verse of a hymn which he had never before heard:

"He came to save our souls from hell.
His love no tongue can ever tell!
He came to die for you and me,
He died in woe on Cavalry!
O he died for you and he died for me,
And he died to set poor sinners free!"

The singer's voice was clear, and the words were warbled forth with a pathos and feeling that went at once to the heart of the listener. The single verse was repeated in birdlike tones with a slight variation of the tune and words. After waiting for a short time, enjoying the song, the stranger walked quietly toward the place whence the sound proceeded, and as he turned the road he saw a young lad of about twelve years seated on a stone wall, and evidently enjoying the beautiful morning.

"Good morning, Pat," said the stranger.

The boy turned quickly; his fresh, bright face, intelligent look, and pleasant smile, won at once the stranger's heart.

"Why," he exclaimed with a slight Irish tone, "an' how did ye'rs know my name was Pat?"

"O I guessed it," said the stranger with a smile.

"Well, and sure, sir, ye guessed wrong, for my name is not that same."

"What is it, then?"

"'It's Andy; Andy O'Hara, at yer service, sir."

"Andy? Well, Andy, you are a fine looking little fellow, and where do you live?"

"Down there, sir, in Ballylin."

"And where, Andy, did you learn that pretty hymn you were singing?"

"Is it where? Wheesh then, sir; sure that's nott o be towld; I learned it unbeknownst."

"Unbeknownst?"

"Yes, unbeknownst to anybody."

"And whom could you have learned it from?"

"Shure, there was a man carrying books about; and it is a great many books he had too. But the priest would not let us spake to him, nor let him sell his books; but indade when the good man spake to me, it wasn't for me to trate him unhandsome; and so I talked with him, and he gave me some little papers with hymns on them. He gave me mother a big book too."

Andy suddenly stopped, and gave the stranger a sharp look.

"Well, my boy!"

"Ah, now, ye'll not be after telling this, sure?"

"O no, no fear of me! Besides, I am here only for a short time, and possibly may never be back again," said the stranger.

Well, he gave me mother a big book; ha—what's this ye call it, now?

"The Bible?"

"Bible, that's it! The priest thought he would drive all them books out entirely; but indade he never could get howld of this. He doesn't know me mother has it, and she keeps it well hid away; heh, it's great!"

"Can your mother read?"

"Read, is it? indade she can read, aye, as well as the priest. She used to live out in a family in Derry when she was young, and they teached her to read."

"Can you read, Andy? You said the man gave you some hymns."

"Indade then, sir, I can just read enough to carry me along paiceably;" and he gave a queer little Irish laugh.

"Why, Andy, you are quite an original," said the stranger, with a smile.

"Rigernal?" asked Andy, with a puzzled look.

"Yes; that means, a queer one."

"A quare one! Ye think I am a quare one, do you, sir? cried Andy, in high glee, and bending forward, he laughed joyously.

"You certainly are a funny little thing," said the gentleman, good-humoredly, laughing in spite of himself.

"I ax your noble honor's pardon," said Andy, with a sly look.

"O laugh on' Andy!" cried the stranger. Then, with a slight cloud over his face, he continued in an under tone: "Poor fellow! you will not have much chance to laugh in such a world as this as you grow older."

Andy sat, silently looking at him.

"Suppose," said the stranger, "we take a walk down to Ballylinn, where you live."

Andy's face brightened at the proposal. Leaping down from the fence he ran along by the stranger's side, laughing and talking with the greatest glee. The stranger, who seemed to be under the influence of some deep seated sorrow, yielded to the cheerful effect of Andy's bright smile and musical laugh, and when they reached Ballylinn he felt better than he had for years.

The cottage in which Andy lived, though of a humble character, was superior to others around it. Standing back from the street, it was ornamented with a few climbing shrubs and trees, and the honeysuckle sent forth its delicious fragrance. It was free also from the pools of stagnant water which defiled the environs of the other cottages.

Upon entering and casting an inquiring glance around him, the stranger was agreeably delighted with the appearance of the room. Instead of the dust and dirt, and air of slovenliness which he had so often seen in other huts in Ireland, there was the cleanliness and neatness of the English cottage. Andy, placing a chair before the stranger, begged him to be seated; and then going toward the stairs, or rather the ladder which led up into a small loft, he called out:

"Mother! mother!"

In a short time the trap-door was opened and Andy's mother came down into the room. She was rather small in size, with the bright eyes and shrewd expression of her son. Dropping a courtesy, she apologized for not being down to receive her visitor.

"I became interested in talking with your boy on the hillside yonder," said the visitor, "and have accompanied him to your house, Mrs. O'Hara."

"And indade then, sir, we are only puir bodies, but a hearty welceme to the likes of you, sir."

"Andy was singing a sweet hymn just now; do you like those hymns too?"

"O sir," said Mrs. O'Hara, looking suspiciously around, "O sir, and it is not here in Ballylinn that we learn to like sich hymns. But I hope the blessed Lord has made me learn to like them better than those we used to sing to the Virgin. But it is very dark, ah, it is very dark for a puir body like me!"

"That same blessed One, Mrs. O'Hara, who taught you to like the pious hymn, can remove all darkness from you."

"He can, sir, he can; bless his holy name! Indade, and I hope he has led me already. O, sir, it's great goodness it is then!"

"I suppose, Mrs. O'Hara, you have to read and pray in secret?"

"True for you, sir," said the old lady in a low voice, "in sacret, yes, in sacret; indade its just so, sir."

"Perhaps it is best so, ma'am, for it happens too often that when we can pray and read the Bible without molestation we become indifferent; but persecution makes us love our Bible and the throne of grace all the better."

"Indade, then, sir, that same is what I sometimes think. But O sir, it would be glad I'd be if I had some one to show me what I cannot understand."

"Do not forget, Mrs. O'Hara, that if we pray, God has promised to give the Holy Spirit as an instructor to those who ask."

At this moment Mrs. O'Hara gave a start, for Andy, who had gone softly toward the door, had given her a sign with his hand. The next instant some one appeared at the door.

"The top of the morning to ye, Father O'Donoghue," said Andy, planting himself in the doorway and making his bow.

But without noticing the boy, the priest stepped forward, and entering the cottage with a frown, he caught sight of the stranger. Instantly, with a still darker frown on his face, he planted his cane firmly on the floor, and with a low whistle of surprise and contempt, ejaculated:

"Whew! what's this, what's this, what's this again?" and turned with the aspect of a thunder-cloud toward Mrs. O'Hara. There was something almost fearful in the appearance of the burly and wrathful priest, especially to a "poor little body" like Andy's mother. At first she cowered beneath his frown; but soon taking courage, and inspirited by some sudden thought, she came forward and confronted the priest, with a firm but respectful look.

"Woman! woman!" cried he, after he had in vain endeavored to make her quail beneath his eye, "I wonder how dare ye to stand there and face me, you who, at your time of life, ought to be an example to your neighbors; you of whom I thought so well, and of whom I have boasted, and indeed thought I had scarcely need to look after at all. Have you come to this? Great heaven! in whom then can one place confidence?"

And the priest cast up his eyes, as if in mute despair. All this, to the shrewd mind of Mrs. O'Hara, seemed so much like acting, that instead of terrifying her, as it was intended, only had the effect of reassuring her.

"Father O'Douoghue," said she, "and indade you well know it's not me that has given you any cause to feel badly; and sure what have I done now?"

"You know well enough," retorted the priest in a voice of thunder, which, however, failed to frighten her. Andy, whose face flushed up with indignation at seeing his mother treated in such a manner, stared fiercely at the priest.

"Maybe ye'llbe after telling what it is my mother's bin doing, ye big black amadhowan," cried he in an uncontrolled burst of anger.

"What! shouted the priest, as though he had been shot. And as Mrs. O'Hara pushed Andy away, and seemed greatly annoyed at his want of reverence, Father O'Donoghue bitterly reproached her.

"See what it's come to," he cried; ye learn your brats to insult me. Woman, woman, you little know what is in store for the likes of you."

"The likes of me," said Mrs. O'Hara, calmly; "and Father O'Donoghue why will ye not tell what's the blame that's in me."

"Tell ye! maybe ye'd like I would tell you. Have ye not been harboring these devil's children, the 'Scripture Readers.' Did ye not keep one here all night a year or two agone, and didn't ye refuse to do penance for such a thing? Haven't you learned your children these devil songs? Don't I hear them singing around—"

"They ain't devil songs," interrupted Andy, angrily.

"Silence, boy!" cried the priest sternly, "let me hear no more from you. Yes, Mrs. O'Hara' and don't I come here, and find you on this blessed morning holding discourse with an emissary of Satan?"

"Stop!" cried the stranger, whom Father O'Donoghue had not regarded, and who had looked upon the scene with a quiet smile, "stop my good man, do you mean to call me an emissary of Satan?" The priest turned toward him with a haughty glance, which the stranger met with a smile. "Because if you do," he added, with the same calm smile, "you might get yourself into trouble."

"What are ye then, I'd like to know?" asked the priest; "are ye not one of those Scripture Readers that are turning the land upside down?"

"My good sir," said the stranger, politely, "I'm not, and it might be as well for you hereafter to be less hasty. I, a plain traveler, stop at a roadside cottage, and the first thing that comes along is a priest, who angrily scolds the good woman with whom I happen to be talking. Really, sir, I know not how to excuse such conduct, and especially from a professed minister of the lowly Jesus.
