Poetry.

For the Christian Watchman.

A LITTLE BOY'S THEOLOGY.

God has made the sea and sky,
All this earth he calls his own,
And He reigns in Heaven on high;
Angels bright surround his throne.

All I have He gives to me;
Friends, companions, parents dear,
He doth watch me constantly,
Though I cannot see He's near.

If I be a wicked boy,
And ungrateful for His love,
He will then my soul destroy;
Keep me from His home above.

But if I live holily,
He will smile upon me then;
For He came and died for me,
Crucified by wicked men.

BETHEL.

I will not let thee go unless thou bless me,
Long have I sought, and I have found at last,
Oh stay till all the sorrows that oppress me
Be overpast.

I will not let thee go until thou bless me,
For I am bowed beneath a load of grief,
From all the ceaseless troubles that distress me
Give me relief.

I will not let thee go until thou bless me,
I hold thee now, and call upon thy name,
Here will I stay long as my sins oppress me
Thy grace to claim.

CHAPTER XII.

CONTINUED.

Such were the conversations which Willie often had with his young companions. The same personal application of the doctrine of eternal punishment was in the mouths of all of them. In their discussions with Willie they sought chiefly to show that it was impossible for him to believe in such a doctrine. His association with them, his conduct toward them, the pleasure which he enjoyed with them, all these, they said, showed that he could not look upon them as lost souls. If he did, why did he not say so—why did he not warn them of their danger, and tell them of the way of escape?

Thus Willie's decline in religious feeling, had placed him in a fearful dilemma. To escape he had to do one of two things. He must at once change his whole life and conversation, and devote himself to the conversion of his friends; or he must go over to their belief. The former he shrank from doing. How could he now talk religion to those gay friends? If he tried it what laughter, and banter, and sarcasm, he would draw upon himself. But in such a case he would inevitably cut himself off from their society, for how could they endure the company of one who only went among them to prophesy woe? On the other hand, what was he to do? Could he take that last step? Could he go over to them? In one word—could he give up the Bible?

Such was the struggle that was going on within him. In his present state he had lost hold of that Rock which is the only foundation for Christian faith. He was tossing and drifting upon a wide sea, at the mercy of the pitiless waves. How could he seek for comfort in his Bible, when already through the arguments of his friends, his faith in that book had been shaken; when he had learned to look upon it as full of inconsistencies, and extravagances which could only be rejected by an elevated mind?—How could he go for refuge to God, when he had learned to look upon Him as one who was too great to notice man but from his exalted station, as Ruler of the Universe, regarded all mankind with equal indifference? Since the Heavenly source of strength was unsought by him, was it strange that he should fall away rapidly and one by one loosen the many bonds that bound him to the faith of his childhood?

All the controversy between Willie and his friends, which spread over every doctrine of the Bible, centred around the great teaching of the eternal blessedness of the righteous, and the eternal misery of the lost. Yet this Willie felt to be blended with the whole life and spirit of the Bible. It lived in every page, and more strongly than all in the teachings of the Saviour. That the world was lost through sin, he knew, but it was the eternity of the ruin that followed this loss, which trouble his soul.

Other thoughts were now associated with these which affected all his future life.

He had been sent here for a special purpose by his generous friend. That friend loved him for the religion which he thought he saw in him. He had been sent here to obtain an education, not for his own personal benefit, but in order that he might afterward devote himself to the ministry. For this was Mr. King's idea, he thought, to do good to the cause of religion, by fitting one for the ministry, whom he supposed to be every way qualified to be useful in that calling.

But he had now reached that state of mind in which he found it impossible for him to preach the gospel. The truths of that gospel had become distasteful to his soul; he refused to recognize them in his present situation; how then could he presume to preach or to teach them to others? Dare he to enter upon that office when he could not fulfil its obligations? In his present state of mind he felt that it would be impossible.

If then he could not enter into the ministry, it was evident that Mr. King's design must fail with respect to him; what he had already spent would be wasted. It would not be just to require him to expend any more on him. This conclusion was inevitable. He could not receive support under wrong impressions on the part of his patron. It would be a hard and a cruel lot to break off his course just as he was approaching the last year; to turn away and lose the crowning studies of his College career; but it must be done. He could not deceive his benefactor, nor treat him unjustly.

Such were the thoughts that filled the mind of Willie. His conclusions seemed to him inevitable. Having taken the steps which he did in his religion, he would have to accept the consequences.

At the end of the third year his mind was made up. He would quit the college. Of course he could not think of returning to be supported by Aunt Helen. He had chosen his own future, and that future must be made by himself.

But he made no such abrupt departure as Henry did. On the contrary, he went to spend the vacation at Aunt Helen's, and during his stay he made known to her the whole truth, gradually, and in different conversations.

The unexpected truth was thus disclosed in such a way as was least injurious. Aunt Helen was thus deeply grieved but not overcome by the news. She tried all that was in her power to shake Willie's resolution, and urged him to talk over his difficulties with some intelligent and pious minister; or with one of his Professors.—This, however, Willie declined doing.

As to his parents, he wrote them a long letter full of affection. In this he informed them that he had concluded not to become a minister, and that Mr. King, for certain reasons which he would not mention, could not assist him any farther. He assured them that he could obtain a situation without any difficulty, and that the generous assistance which he had hitherto received, would fully enable him to support himself in comfort.

Finally, he wrote a long letter to Mr. King, thanking him for his benevolence. He detailed the experience which he had received, and the changes which had taken place in his religious sentiments; informed him of the resolution which he had been compelled to take. With this, he bade him farewell.

After spending about three weeks with Aunt Helen, he bade her good-bye, and departed to seek his fortune in the Great West.

CHAPTER XIII.

The only idea which Willie had on his departure, was the vague one of getting a situation out West. His Aunt wished him to remain in New York, but he was unwilling to do this. He had not fixed upon any plan of action, but simply looked out for something to turn up. He thought so incessantly about the nature of the step itself which he had taken, that he gave but little attention to his own personal prospects.

Was he right thus to cut himself off from a bright future; thus to sever his connection with college; and throw away the disinterested friendship of Mr. King? Had he then gone forth irrevocably from the teachings of his childhood; had he so completely given up the Bible, that this course was necessary? Would it not have been better for him to wait? Perhaps if he had his new views might have been modified or totally changed. Had he not been altogether too hasty? But then the thought of his companions recurred to his mind. How could he resume his place among them. Silby had graduated, and left, but others were there. Could he go back among them as a believing Christian, and fulfil a Christian's duties, by warning them of their danger?

Such were the thoughts that distracted him on his journey to the West. He had taken a through-ticket to Cincinnatti, and so he rolled along, hour after hour, over the long way for many hundreds of miles. All was new. He passed beyond the Hudson Valley, and through the bustling towns of Troy, Schenectady, and on to the tumult and surging life of Buffalo. Then on along the Southern borders of Lake Erie, over whose waters he could look, as he rode along, and watch the countless sails that glistened from afar, like white clouds over all the bright blue surface of the water. Onward still through the streets of Cleveland, where turning southwardly the road bore him through many a laughing valley, and over many a fertile plain, past busy villages and hamlets, and through vigorous young cities that sprung up on every hand, with the strength and lusty life of giants. At length the thousand weary miles were traversed, and Willie stepped forth with his valise into the streets of Cincinnatti.

His first emotions were those of astonishment. Prepared as he was to find a large and flourishing city, he was surprised at its real magnitude. In length and breadth; in costly and magnificent architecture; in its rushing torrent of life; in its endless train of horses, carriages, and busy men of all classes and conditions, who ever hurried past; it rivalled New York itself. Far and wide o'er the plain Cincinnatti, show out its streets, till they stopped at the barrier of lofty hills that encircled it, and then, repelled from these, it overleaped the river on the opposite side, to form new cities on the Southern shore.

Here first he felt discouragement, and his hopeless situation burst full upon his mind.—How could he obtain a situation here? How could he fight his way among so many struggling thousands? What steps could he take?—To whom should he go first?

Evidently there was a necessity for immediate action. His whole property now amounted to about five dollars. In addition to this he had a watch which had been given him by Mr. King and upon this he intended to fall back, if reduced to the last extremity. Accordingly he spent the first day of his arrival in searching out a cheap boarding house, in which, after much difficulty he was successful.

Then he began his search after a place. Naturally diffident, and of a retiring disposition, he felt it to be indeed an irksome task to go around from office to office, and from store to store to put in his claims.

He tried the offices first for he felt that these would be best suited to his tastes. He went to all that come in his way without much regard to the branch of business which was pursued. In most of them he was received with politeness; many of them had no vacancy; in others he was asked what he could do. But he could not keep books, he understood nothing about accounts, he did not know even the most ordinary forms, nor could he have made out the simplest bill of parcels. Upon finding out his utter deficiencies the inquirer would invariably decline employing him. More and more painfully as each hour passed away, he felt his utter deficiency. One man to whom he spoke ventured to give him some advice.

"It is a hard chance young man," said he, "that you have. You say you can do absolutely nothing. Now the business of Banking, and Insurance, and Brokerage, and every branch of commerce requires a knowledge of accounts.—You must see that you have no chance at all."

Willie asked where he might be likely to get a situation.

My advice to you is to look around among the retail stores. Take any chance that offers and work your way up."

Willie then prepared to act upon that advice. But he met with the same result in his search here as elsewhere. In these stores there were many vacancies, but they required clerks of some experience. Willie however was less adapted for a store than for an office. He was utterly ignorant of all kinds of goods, and all modes of trade. Besides his thoughtful and studious face did not favor his search, for in stores they wish to have quick and eager men of action.

Ten days thus passed away and Willie was beginning to be discouraged. He wandered sadly down to the levee, and looked upon the fleet of steamers that lay there. One was a small wheeler that was just preparing to leave. There was some confusion on board that attracted the young man's notice. The captain of the steamer was running around cursing and swearing.

"If that clerk is'nt on a spree again may I be boiled in oil," said he.

"He hasn't been here to-day at all," said one of the men.

Willie hurried forward leaped aboard, and stood before the captain. A bright idea had struck him.

"Do you want a clerk?" said he.

The captain eyed him closely from head to foot.

"Have you any recommendations."

"No," said Willie, none with me."

"Well stranger," said the captain after another sharp survey of the youth, you look like an honest man, and bein' as how I allars look sharp after business myself, likewise in a mortal hurry—I don't mind if I do give you a trial.—Thar's the office."

In a quarter of an hour more Willie was steaming down the Ohio River.
