Poetry.

For the Christian Watchuan.

COME TO THE SAVIOUR.

Come to the Saviour—Ho
All who are sighing!—
Come with your lead of woe,
Unto Him crying.
Come to the Blessed, who
Knoweth no sadness,
For he hath promised you
Heavenly gladness.

Come to the Saviour, ye
Fainting and weary;
Come, if your journey be
Thorny and dreary.
Ah, there's a friend who is
Strong to uphold you,
Cry to the Mighty—His
Arms will enfold you.

Come to the Saviour, O
Guilt over-laden—
Shrink not in terror, though
Foul be your burden.
Come—He hath given His
Blood for your sighing;
Come—all your ransom is Paid by His dying.

Come to the Saviour, ye
Sin beguiled mortals;
Dare ye tread downward the
Path to Death's portals?—
Rouse ye! O, spurn the vile
Fiends who enthrall you,
Come to the Saviour, while
Still He doth call you.

Come to the Saviour—O
Wait not the morrow;—
Time for delaying no
Longer dare borrow.
See how the shadows are
Gathering o'er you;
Haste 'ere the opened door
Closes before you.

CHAPTER IX.

CONTINUED.

The first year of Willie's College life passed away without any change. He was attentive to his studies, and advanced rapidly. He made many friends among his class-mates, and found them pleasanter associates than any with whom he had met before.

His father and mother were as usual, so that he was no longer a prey to deep anxiety on his mother's account. He wrote to them constantly, detailing all the little events of his life, and taking good care to let them see that the advantages so providentially thrown in his way, had not been wasted.

At last vacation came, and he prepared to go to visit his Aunt. He found his new home about as usual. A shade of deeper anxiety was visible in Aunt Helen's face, which excited his sympathy. She received him with tears of joy, and the affection which she had always shown for him seemed even stronger than before. She received him again with the eager love that commonly belongs only to mothers.

Willie tried to find out what might be the cause of her anxiety, but in vain. She turned away his questions, and denied that she was any different from what she always was. But Willie could not be deceived. At length he thought that it was caused by Henry.

Henry, however, was more serious and quiet than before. Indeed, a great change had come over him. His old impetuosity had been exchanged for a grave and thoughtful demeanour. He spoke but little, and used to sit for hours thinking. It was not ill health that caused this, but evidently some all-pervading thought, which he was constantly revolving in his mind. He showed the utmost joy at seeing Willie again, and it was evident that his heart was as sound as ever, although his mind might be more preoccupied.

"Henry," said Willie, to him one day, "what is it that makes you so thoughtful, and Aunt Helen so sad?"

"Is mother sad?" said Henry, with a shocked expression.

"She seems so to me."

"Very likely. Things are not going very well with us. She lost some property lately, and I am afraid she will have to sell her house. My salary is a mere trifle; and I can scarcely hope to be of any assistance to her for some time to come."

"At any rate, you have good prospects."

"No. That's the worst of it. I have no prospects at all."

"You can look forward to advancement or increase of salary, can't you?"

"To some extent, but it does not amount to anything. The fact is, my present look-out is enough to make me thoughtful. All my life lies before me, but in my present position, there is nothing at all to make me hopeful. Do you think it is the proper thing for me to stay here where every situation is filled, and never have a chance of rising."

"Oh, you would like to leave New York, would you? How do you like business?"

"Well, to tell the truth, I can now like anything. An active life would suit me best, but I am not particular."

"Surely you cannot find any other place so good as New York."

"Yes I can."

"Where?"

"California,"—said Henry.

"California! Do you still hold on to that idea? What could you do there. If men go there and break down, there could be but a slight chance for you."

"I feel that I could do something. Do you think it is a pleasant thing for me to stay here and see my dear mother growing sad, and falling into poverty, while I must stand by and do nothing? No Willie—I feel that something must be done."

"But she would never let you go to California."

"Ah, there's the trouble"—said Henry,—"She'd rather lose all that she has, than part with me—poor mother!"—and a tear started to his eye.

"I don't see how it's possible for you to go away with her consent, and I don't think that you are the fellow that would go away without it"—said Willie.

"Perhaps not," said Henry. "At the same time I would not like to tell her everything that is going on in my mind. She has an idea of my feelings, though, for I'm determined not to keep everything from her. If the blow must come, she will have some idea of it."

"Pooh, Henry—don't talk about blows. You could not have the heart to do anything to distress her."

"Whatever I do, will be done altogether for her—and her only"—said Henry, in a tone of tender affection, that impressed itself deeply on Willie's memory.

Affairs resumed their usual course. Willie went back to College, and Henry went to his business.

Several months after this, there came an eventful morning. Henry did not come down to his breakfast. His mother went up to his room to see what was the matter. Henry was not there. The bed had not been slept in, but on the table there lay a letter. She tore it open with a beating heart. It was from Henry. It was all blotted with tears. She sank upon the bed, and with a cold chill of terror, read the following:—

"MY DARLING MOTHER,

When you get this, I will be at sea, on my way to California. I have thought over it for a year. I tremble to think of your grief. But it must be done. My darling mother, cheer up, and do not be afraid. I will write to you constantly.

"I saw how poor you were getting. My own prospects at the store were bad. I knew that it would be many years before I could do any thing for you. Yet I am full of energy, and am old enough to work my way alone, up to independence.

"A young man who went to California last year, wrote me that he could easily get me a situation, and said that sober lads could do first rate: This decided me. I knew that you would not consent, so I have had to go away without it. My dearest mother, it is for your sake only that I go away, when I return I will be able to make you happy.

"Willie's vacation will begin again next week. He will be home to comfort you. You will not be so very lonely, dear mother, for he will help to supply my place.

Your loving son,
HENRY."

Then followed a postscript underscored.

P. S.—"I took with me the little Bible you gave me. I promise you to read it every day."
HENRY.

CHAPTER X.

The tidings fell upon Willie like a thunderbolt. It is true that Henry had hinted about this on several previous occasions. But yet he was utterly astonished and confounded. If Henry had committed suicide, he would not have been more overcome.

His presence was the greatest comfort to Aunt Helen. When he read the letter, he found much in it from which he could draw hope and solace. In his desire to console Aunt Helen, he even went so far as to make light of the affair.

"Why, look at it Aunt. The only thing that is really troublesome about it, is its suddenness. You were completely unprepared. The thing itself is not so bad. Young fellows are leaving for California every week. Business is far better there than here, and there are good openings for young men. Henry is resolute and persevering. His business life thus far has improved him greatly. At the present time he is more of a man than I am. I have confidence in him, and I believe he will make his way on in the world wherever he is.

"Besides, you ought to be grateful to think that he does this from a right motive. His act may be wrong, but his intention is good. He does it for you. He wishes to be in a position to assist you. Can anything be more noble than this? He loves you as well as ever. Poor Henry! how he cried over that letter.

"Think too, dear Aunt Helen, how considerate he is. He has taken his Bible with him, and has promised to read it every day. He knew of how much importance you would think this was, and he has acted like a noble fellow and a good son. So your only trouble is that he has left you suddenly. Think how much better it will be for him, and in fact, for both of you, in the end.

"You will soon get another letter from him, and then you will be more reconciled."

In this way Willie tried to comfort her. His words had some effect. But still the blow had been so terrible, that she could not rally from its effects for a long time. For her boy Henry was the idol of her heart. Her tender and affectionate nature made her cling to him with a passion of love, which was now all the more violent, since its dear object had been torn away.

In the course of three or four weeks there arrived a letter from Henry. He had reached the Isthmus, and was on his way. His courage was high, and his determination unshaken. But his tender love for his mother showed no abatement whatever, he told her everything that could possibly be of interest to her, and assured her over and over again, that he was in good health.—Then in a little postscript he told her that he read his Bible every day, a thing which he had never done before, and that she ought to be thankful that he had gone if it were only for this.

Aunt Helen could only rely upon that Being whom she loved and trusted. To Him she carried her load of trouble and deep anxiety. She committed her griefs to Him, and sought for comfort from this unfailing source.

Willie returned again to College, leaving Aunt Helen more reconciled to her troubles, though still very melancholy. It pained his heart to see her in such a state, but he did all that he could to comfort her, and wrote her letters of hope, and sympathy, and good cheer.

College life again opened around him. Silby was warmly attached to him, and associated with him constantly. He introduced him to all of his own friends, and had him elected to the membership of a College secret society. Here Willie became connected with a circle of choice spirits who were certainly very amiable and clever young men, but not at all the kind who are adapted to improve one's spiritual condition, or benefit a young christian in his struggle with the world.

Among these, he first heard religion spoken of in a slighting manner. The old truths which had been the treasures of his life, which he had associated with all that was reverend and sacred, were treated by these young men with a quiet contempt that was more dangerous than a hundred arguments. Above all, the doctrines of Eternal punishment, was especially despised, and when the conversation turned upon religious subjects, they showed most clearly to themselves, how inconsistent such a doctrine was with the benevolence and wisdom of God.

In these rooms, also, he first became acquainted with the writing of Infidels. These he looked over, and soon read. In the course of a few months, he had become acquainted with many of the most subtle and dangerous arguments against Evangelical religion that are in existence.

At first he looked upon all these influences with a certain degree of timidity and suspicion. Gradually, however, he became more familiar with them, and his fear passed away.

"Vice is a monster of so hateful mien
That to be dreaded, needs but to be seen,
But seen too oft, familiar with her face
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Thus it was with Willie. Familiarity with danger made him bolder, and even before he was conscious of its effects, the poison had sunk into his soul.

Of all these young men, Silby was the most dangerous. He was so perfectly good-natured, and amiable, so clever and gay; he could say such witty things, and make himself so pleasant to his friends, that he was a universal favourite. His easy contempt for religion was more dangerous than open opposition from others, and was of a kind which was calculated to be transmitted to any one with whom he associated.

While Willie was in this position at College, Aunt Helen was recovering to some extent from her grief.

She received letters from Henry by every mail. He had obtained an excellent situation, and by steady application to business, untiring industry, good sense, and docility, he was rapidly gaining the esteem of his employers.

Once or twice he enclosed her some money, partly, he said, just to show her that he was economical, and partly, for her to put in the Savings' Bank for him.

But what cheered Aunt Helen most of all, was the little postscript which Henry always put at the end of every letter.

P. S.—"Dearest mother, I read my Bible every day.
HENRY."

I have much pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your "TONIC EXTRACT" in the cure of Indigestion.
I had for a length of time suffered much from weakness of the Digestive Organs, and the consequent enervation of the system, and had tried many highly-extolled Tonics without being relieved; but I may thankfully state that your Superior Compound has restored me to perfect health, in a manner that I could scarcely have believed a short time ago.
Heartily recommending a trial of the "Tonic Extract," to those who may be seeking for such a remedy.
I am, Dear Sir, yours very Respectfully.
