THE NOBMAN OF EARTH.

The truest nobman of earth, Is he who loses to be The first champion of the good, The best of his own race.

Who works unaided for the poor, Who seeks no rank in names; Whose hope is heaven in crowds, As sparks fly from a flame!

Give me that nobman of mind, Who saves a noble cause; The right of law to every one, And freedom's righteous laws! The labor of each who schemes A tyrant's aid; A man's strength about his heart, Thoughts brilliant in his brain!

I love the nobman of earth, Who strives to bless the age, And leave a glory that is caught On history's faithful page! Burst through his prison bars! Truth's sure undimmed quest; Who shines in love as does the sun In glory of the West!

He's deathless as the mighty skies, When jeweled through with stars; Could foot God's beauty in a blaze Of light, he'd be the stars!

No mandate from the tyrant breaks His spirit's upward bound; While high on every liberal creed His name was blazoned round!

And perjured kings may pass from earth, Their pomp and lustre fade; But true nobman's unchangeable laws The earth loves they made.

His worshipped monarch is his God, He leaves a name that's true; His words with all that's noble, reflect His Majesty of mind.

course, devoted to the use of the invalid.

The rest of the Bellamy family found accommodation at the little village inn. But as this establishment was not carried on in very grand style and as Mr. Bellamy had important and urgent business in London and also as the surgeon gave strong assurance that Miss Bellamy had received no serious injury, it was agreed in the course of next morning that they should all proceed at once to town, leaving the second girl as a nurse and companion to her sister. This second girl was a good natured, affectionate creature, with just enough fun and high spirits in her composition to make her ready for any bit of harmless mischief, but far too much gentleness to suffer her to carry her love of teaching beyond the point where it ceases to be agreeable. On her return from seeing her parents, sister and brother off by the train, this young lady seemed to have a full consciousness of the independence of her position as temporary guardian of her elder sister. As she passed through the garden she pulled a large nosegay of flowers, to decorate the chamber of the invalid.

"Aller dear!" she said, as she went in, "have you sent to enquire after the health of your neighbour?"

"No, not from myself," replied Alice blushing; "papa and mamma went in, you know to thank him before they left."

"Yes," said the younger one; "but I really think after all that happened, it would be only common gratitude and politeness in you to send a message from yourself. Do you know that the people who got you out of the carriage say that if he had not struggled so hard to keep the great bar of timber from crushing you, it must have broken your neck. Only think of that! And he broke his leg in doing so. Don't you think I ought to go to him, and take a kind of a message from you?"

"Oh, no! dear, I think not. It would look so forward."

"Forward! Nonsense! Did he think about being forward when he ran the risk of getting killed in saving you?"

"I think you'd better not," said the younger one; "and the fact, Alice blushed and stopped. Perhaps she was thinking of the checks that had involuntarily run so close together of the gentle pressure, and the murmured blessing as she was released."

"What don't I know?" asked her sister. "Why Alice you are blushing. Surely he could not have made love to you while you were boxed up there with all your limbs broken?"

"Now don't talk nonsense, Ellen."

"Well, nonsense or no nonsense, you are blushing worse than before. Now, do tell me all about it, that's a dear."

"Don't be so silly. There's nothing to tell, only that it was very awkward to be shut up there in the arms of the strange gentleman not able to stir an inch, and his whiskers tickling my nose."

"In the arms! Were you really? La! how funny! How did you get there?"

"Very naturally—"

"So I suppose," observed Ellen demurely, "it was quite natural that when I was thrown forward by the stopping of the train, he should put out his arms either to catch me or defend himself. I do not know which."

"I do, though, again interrupted the provoking Ellen, I saw him stealing glances at you all the morning. Well, so he caught you in his arms, and what then?"

"Why, when once I was there, and the smother taken place, there was no possibility of getting away again."

"Oh! no! I understand. And so, what with the arms that couldn't be got away again, and the whiskers and noses, and all he felt himself obliged to kiss you. Now, own the truth, Alice, did he not?"

"No—no—no," replied Alice emphatically, "I am sure he would not be guilty of such rudeness."

"What was it, then?" persisted Ellen, "I am quite positive there was something."

"Oh, no, there was not. He merely said, 'God bless you,' as I was lifted out."

"Quite sufficient to make out a case. Now I know all about it; I shall take him the vase of flowers with my love."

"Ellen! are you mad?"

"Perfectly sane, I assure you. Why should I not go? It will give great pleasure and make him very happy, poor fellow! Only think of his being laid up there with his leg broken for your sake; and you have not the common gratitude to send him a few flowers to comfort him!"

"Well,—take him the flowers if you like; but for mercy's sake don't be so foolish as to take any ridiculous message, as if from me."

"I'll be discreet, I promise you," said Ellen, very gravely, as she went towards the door; "so you shall," she added, looking back maliciously, "that I had better not allude to the kiss?"

"You know there was not any allude to, you plague me. Give him my love—what can I say. It seems odd to say compliments, when he has saved my life!"
