Anguish of the Empress .- A messenger had been sent on at a gallop to inform the Empress, whe was at the Porte Dauphine (Bois de Boulogne,) of what occurred, and to re-assure her as to the safety of her husband. In less than half an hour, the Empress returned from her drive in an open carriage, with the Emperor riding close by. The sight was touching in the extreme. Her Majesty was deeply affected; her tears flowed in spite of her, she in vain essayed to dry them, and she sobbed convulsively amid her efforts to smile with joy at her husband's escape from the murderer. Evidently she could not subdue her emotion; she leant back in her carriage, and relieved her heart in an uncontrolled burst of tears. Then, indeed, it was the people that thronged the way gave full vent to the more generous feelings of our nature.
