The New Creation.

What a blessed change I find Since I entertained this guest; Now, methinks, another mind Moves and rules within my breast; Surely I am not the same That I was before He came; But I then was much to blame.

All the ways of righteousness
I did think were full of trouble,
I complained of tediousness And each duty seemed double Whilst I served Him, but of fear, Every moment did appear Longer far than a whole year.

But the case is altered now; He no sooner turns His eye
But I quickly bend and bow,
Ready at his feet to lie.
Love hath taught me to obey All His precepts, and to say, "Not to-morrow, but to-day."

What He wills, I say I must, What I must, I say I will; He commanding, it is just What He would I should fulfil;
Whilst He biddeth I believe,
What He calls for He will give, To obey Him is to live.

His commandments grievous are not,
Longer than men think them so,
Though He send me forth, I care not,
Whilst He gives me strength to go: When or whither, all is one, On his business, not mine own, I shall never go alone.

Since I am complete in Him, And in Him all fulness dwelleth; I am sure aloft to swim Whilst that Ocean overswelleth. Having Him that's all in all, I am confident I shall Nothing want for which I call.

Misclany.

An Incident In American Slavery.

" A southern trader had been commissioned to purchase a blacksmith, and to pay any price for one of superior skill and qualifications wherever he might be found. In his roamings about the country he heard of one belonging to a rich lady, but doubted about being able to obtain him, as necessity would not compel her to part with him, and he had been long a faithful servant in her family. She was sick, too, and would not as a dying act wish to sell from his wife and children one who had proved of such invaluable service to her.

"But a thousand dollars proved a temptation which even a dying woman could not resist, and the bargain was finished, and the soul and body of a noble man consigned as property to a heartless trader, without a word of consultation with him on the subject. On being called and informed of the transfer, he exciaimed in bitter agony, 'What have I done to deserve this? Have I not been a faithful servant, laboring night and day for my mistress, without ever in a single instance ever refusing to obey orders?' Here his voice chocked that he could not speak, as he seemed overwhelmed with a sense of the wrong which had been done him, and of his helplessness; but soon added, Well, I know I am a poor slave, and must submit to my fate, but it is hard.'

"The trader was neither moved to compassion nor kindness, and approached to place upon his lim's the galling fetters, which were only the symbols of a more galling servitude, when the negro ventured again to remonstrate. He did not ask for freedom, or to be returned to his mistress .-Alas! the thought of her must have been bitterness indeed to him now-but he asked the one little boon of being permitted to see his wite and children before he was separated from them for-

"'I know,' he said, 'I am your slave. You have bought me and paid for me, and I am bound to obey you. This I will not refuse to do. But I have a wife and little children two miles from here, with whom I have lived very happy. Will you not permit me to see them once more before I go? I promise solemnly I will return to-morrow morning, and go with you and do your bidding without a murmur.'

"'No,' said the trader, 'you cannot go.' "' But oh, it is very hard that I cannot see my wife and children before I go, and bid them farewell. I am a man of truth, and I promise faithfully to return to-morrow morning if you will let me go.'

"'No,' was the indignant answer; 'you cannot go; and you may as well come along without any more fuss.'

" Well,' answered the honest and injured husband and father, 'I must submit. I cannot help myself. But I tell you plainly I will never serve you; I will never perform a single act for your am Alexander the Great," said the monarch; are manufactured under our own immediate inspection, we

"' Oh, I am troubled about that,' said the trader; 'I know how to deal with such as you, and have no fears about your obeying my commands.' And he placad the manacles upon his wrists and ankles, gave him a blow from his whip, and he was driven away.

"How the proud spirit chafed and writhed in the fetters! But, as he said, there was no help. For several days he was detained at a stationhouse, till a large gang was collected, when they were marched off towards their southern destination. There was no further remonstrance, and no attempt at escape; till with feet sore and bleeding. from days and nights of constant tramping upon thorny paths and burning sands, they encamped upon the borders of a running stream for a little rest. The men reclined in their chains upon the ground, and the women were strewed in heaps among the baggage of the wagons. The moon shone clear and bright, and scarcely a breath of air stirred the leaves of the trees above their heads, and all were asleep. It was not a night to favor improvements had been adopted by the apostles crime; yet revenge burned so hotly in the bosom of the outraged negro that he could not longer delay. His trade had made him familiar with iron lay. His trade had made him familiar with iron links, and with a little application of his skill his bonds were loosened, and he was free. But he did not attempt to fly. He crept stealthily to the tent of the trader, and with one blow of the axe severed his head from his body!—then returned to his resting-place and slept soundly till morning!

When Dionysius of Alexandria was arraigned before the Prefect, and ordered to recant, and commanded to adore the gods, he answered, that the one God only ought to be worshipped. The Prefect replied by a question, why other gods might not be worshipped in connection with that of the Christians? From this it is evident that the worship of Christ might have been tolerated, if it had "The break of day revealed the terrible deed, admitted the partnership of otner gods. It was the
