BRITISH REFORM.—Parliament met the 7th, when the Address in answer to the Royal Speech was agreed to without a division, and with little discussion, in both Houses. The only noticeable feature—but that is very noti-toon, in the course of the discussion, that he had made up his mind to introduce a new Re-form Bill in the next session of Parliament. The noble Lord deprecated any attempt at partial measures of reform in the present short session, when there was so much of other im-portant business to be attended to; but he added, that he would employ the interval of the next recess to prepare a Bill which should meet the just expectations of the people, which should remedy the admitted defects of the present system, and which should admit fliction of the punishment. At this announco-ment, the Nor hern King's followers, being pre-viously instructed, manifested the utmost sorrow and distress. The reader probably anticipates the sequel.— It is thus described by Dr. Bridgman :— "As the second day advanced, some of the fa-vorites were permitted to enter and riffe the palace of the slaughtered 'rebel." But the scene of greatest interest lay in another quarter. In front of Hung's palace, in accordance with the summons of the previous day, multitudes had issembled at an early hour; and there, not many yards from the tribunal from behind which de yards from the tribunal from behind which de be beneficial. When the Eastern King's plot was rovealed to the Celestial King, the latter summoned to Nan kin the "Assistant King," Wei. The Assistant King, however, refused to obey the summons, he being friendly to the Eastern King, Yang. As he did not make his appearance, it was supposed he had taken umbrage and joined the imperialists. Events proved, however, that the surmise was without foundation. He gathered his adherent aud sent to the Celestial King a demand for Wei'a head, on pain of an attack upon Nankin and is destruction. The demand was complied with. The head of the Northern King was take of, placed an a box, dispatched to the camp of the Assistant King, and there, with many other space. These events occurred in November last.
