The Drunkard's Wife's Address to the Wife of the Spirit-Dealer.

BT A LADY.

The brand of guilt is on your brow, The price of blood is in your hand, Ye feed yourselves from human woe, Ye trample on each social band.

I may not curse my fellow-man, Though dyed his soul in deepest guilt; Consuming fire I would not claim To avenge the wrongs that I have felt.

But oh ! ten thousand curses blast And sweep away that hell-born trade, Which daily gathers its repast From vanquished reason, virtue dead !

Laws of my country, and ean ve No shelter to the wretched give? And is it-can it-shall it be That man upon man's crimes must live ?

Poor is your aid-the paltry boon The crushed and withered heart disdains; Ye cannot chase away our gloom, Or break my husband's galling chains.

Ye may the ill-got pittance wrench From wordid wretches void of shame, Who stiffe conscience, feeling quench, In the debasing lust of gain,

But can ye snap the drunkard's chain, And peace and purity restore-And give to wife and friends again The love-the joys-was their's before ?

How can ye ?- while the cause ye nurse Which madness, crime, and misery brings-How can ye dry the river's course,

But how needful to us all is the prayer that our gracious Lord has taught us to pray, "Lead us not into ten ptation, but deliver us from evil!" I am afraid poor John did not think of this prayer; so when temptation came, and it is constantly coming to every came, and it is coastantly coming to every one of us; he fell into "evil." John went every day to a free school which was in the tows where he lived; and one Saturday morning in the month of November, some of came, and it is constantly coming to every Saturday. His poor parents were very much morning in the month of November, some of the boys told him that a stag had been brought in a covered cart, and was going to be turned in All that day and the next they sought out in a field at the top of the hill just out of him among their friends and acquaintances, the town, at eleven o'clock to be hnnted by and in the woods ; they dragged the large the dogs and a great many men on horseback ; mill pond, and searched the little stream that Now landing ex Arthur White from London, the foland that many of the boys were going to runs past the town, but John could no where leave school early in order to go and see the be found, and at just they were obliged to give poor stag turned out to be hunted.
