'Hear the throbbings of that gentle heart-I see that restless eye with anguish rolling And at each sound, the quick convulsive start-Then the mute agony beyond controlling.'

MARY WILSON, I knew her long years ago-before sorrow had marred her beanty or clouded her mind, when she was a little playful girl, with rosy cheeks and sunny brow. She was the sunlight of her father's hearth. A little angel that was continually singing of peace, hope, and joy. Often have I plucked for her the sweetest flowers that adorned the fields or fringed the wayside with beauty, and gathered the wild rosy berries, and strung them around her neck, and felt proud of my little rustic beauty. In after years we spent many happy hours together, when the simple days of childhood were passed away. But even in her riper years as she was as unaffected in her ways and manners as she was in the innocence of childhood. Without hesitation, I apply to her the language of the poet-

Of virtue the goodness-of beauty the queen.

I saw her often in the spler.dour of her' own home-surrounded with all the comforts of life-without a shade of present sorrow or fear for the future. Her husband was a habits, and engaged in a lucrative and success ful business. The sun of present and prospective joy beamed brightly on the morning of thir married life. A few years of unbroken prosperity and unmarred happiness glided swifily away. Ah! how swiftly they pass! How easily and fondly do we gather up the happy events which have passed away. As the skilful artist transfers to his canvass the beauty of the landscape, so does the mind treasure up the memories of the past. With what pensive gadness do we recall the sunny dreams of childhood and youth. As the rose, though crushed and withered, retains its fragrance, so does memory retain those images that endeared themselves to us in bygone days. And often in the dark hour of trial do we recall the pleasures that lie enshrined in the past, drawing happiness from the sweet recollection of former years. It was so with Mary Wilson. For many years her happiness lay centered in the memory of the past. A few more years and Mary Wilson and I met once more.
