(For the " Religious Intelligencer ") ALONE.

RESPECTFULLY INSCRIBED TO & FRIEND IN ST. JOHN.

I'm sitting all alone, L zzie, Where all i bright and clear,-The autumn winds are wail ng by, The leaves are dead and sire ; The winds are waiting by, Lizzie, And sadly do they moan, They fill my heart with silent grief, For 1 am all alone.

I gaze around me now, Lizzie, Ou flowers fading fast They but remind me of the joys. And pleasures that have past ;--I gieve not that the flowers must fade, Or autumn winds do blow, But ye', my friend, I stil must sigh For days of long ago!

Although my soul is sad, Lizzie, It may not always be; I know that grief must pass away, As evening standows flet ! The mist may linger for a while But soon the sun will shine, Removing every anxious care, Far from this heart of mine.

The joys of earth are frail Lizzie They quickly pass away; But there are brighter joys above That never can decay: Supported by exhaustless care Are those bright worlds on high, There joys can never fade, Lizzie, Nor pleasures ever die. R. A. S.

Hamstead, Oct. 13th, 1858.

OR, THE MINISTER AND THE HAMS.

Many years since there lived in Philadelphia a gentleman of talent and cultivation who had acquired a penurious habit. It was so well known, that after he became a professor of relig on, it was regarded as a task both dis aste ul and useless to call upon him for any benevient enterprise. On one occasion, however, a committee of two gentlemen made up their minds to put him to the test. The object, on behalf of which they desired contributions, was eminently a good one, and they were courieously receiv ed, but when their object was made known, the gentieman's visage long hened, and he was profuse in the expression of his good wishes, but he really could not contribute. Determined not to be easily foiled, the collectors set the object before him in all possible I ghts, and kin ilv said some things which I might reach his conscience.
