Address to Retailers.

Ye, who, regardless of your coun ry's good, Fill up your coffers with the price of blood; Who pour out poison with a liberal hand, And scatter crime and misery through the land; Through now rejoicing in the midst of hea th, In full possession of ill-gotten wealth, Yet a few days, at most, the hour must come, When ye shall know the poison sellers doom, And shrink beneath it; for upon you all The indignation of a God shall fa!l.

Bear this in mird; ye have at your command The power to bless, or power to curse the land, It we wilt sell, Intemperance still will roll Her wave of butterness o'er many a soul. Still shall the wife for her lost husband mourn, And sigh for days that never shall return. Still that unwelcome sight our eyeashall gree Of beggard children roaming in the street; And thousands whom our labour cannot save Go trembling, tottering, reeling, to the grave.

Still loitering at your shop the livelong day, Will scores of loungers pass their hours away And e'en the peaceful night for rest ordained, Shall with their noisy revels be profoned. The poi-onous cup will pass, and murth and glee Gild o'er the surface of their misery ; Uproars laughter, fill each place between-Harsh oaths, ungodly songs, and jests obscene. And there you'll stand amid that drunken throng Laugh at the jest, and glory in the song.

How oft you see the children of the poor, With unshed feet, unwilling, throng your door, And carry with them, as they homeward go, The fruitful source of wretchedness and woe-That which will change the father to a beast; That which will rob a mother of her rest : And take from half-fed children needful bread, And give them curses, frowns, and blows, instead!

Pour out your poison 'till some victim dies, Then go, and at his funeral wipe your eyes: Join there that mourning throng, with solemn

And help to bear him to the burial place, There stands his wife, with weeping children.

While their fast-falling tears bedew the ground From many an eye the gem of pity starts, And many, a sigh from sympathizing hearts Comes labouring up, and almost chokes the breath, While thus they gaze upon the work of death, I he task concludes; the relics of the dead, Are slowly settled to their damp, cold bed.

Come, now, draw near, my money-making friend : You saw the starting-Come and see the end. When you first filled his glass, one wou'd suffice; Look now into that open grave, and say, Dost feel no sorrow, no remorse, to day? Does not your answering conscience loud declare. That your cursed avarice has laid him there?

Only a Raffle.

" Pshaw! harm-what a squeamish fellow you are, Stanton? Why, it's nothing but a raffle, and merely designed to give a Mittle zest to an agree ble party. Didn't von know there's not the least possiblerisk in it? I can tell you that they act on the same principle in church fairs, and that good church members buy tickets for pictures, and quilts, and p ano-fortes, and all that sort of thing .-If they can do it, I'm sure we can, who don't pretend to any special piety."

Thus reasoned Harry Brooks, a young man of twenty, while endeavoing to per suade his friend, Miles Stanton, to take part in a raffle. Miles had been carefully ecucated, and had always looked with suspicion upon all games of chance, as not cely hazar. dons but immoral and pernicious in their tendency; but the cunning and specious argument of Brooks somewhat unsettled his convictions. "True, enough," he said to him self (and pity 'tis he had cause to say it) " they do encourage such practices at fairs, and, after all it would be but paying a trifffor a good supper; only a shilling." And, alis! he yielded-as Harry knew he would -and yet, there was a voice, and it sounded wondrously like the gentle tone of his angel mother, saying, "Go not in the way of the
