Writen on the death of Mrs. Sarah Boardman Judson, wife of Rev. Dr. Judson, missionary to Maulmain, who died on her passage to America, and whose remains were interred at St. Helena.

BY MISS ELLEN T. HARRINGTON.

That quiet and secluded isle, Encircled by the wave; Once boasted of a trophied pile, The far-famed hero's grave, Now claims another honored mound, The grave of worthy dust ; Whose life with virtues ever crowned, The Almighty God her trust.

And thou art there! there is thy tomb, Thy long and last repose, Unmarked save by the flowret's bloom, Or wild and lonely rose; "Tis hallowed, yea the winds will not In wild and deaf'ning rave, Disturb that consecrated spot, The peaceful Christian's grave.

But fate ordained thy lonely grave In this abode of rest, And not upon the darkened wave Of ocean's heaving crest; Yet would thy friends of kindred tie. A true, devoted band, Have wished that they might see the die In thy own native land

Yet living friends why will ye weep O'er the beloved dead? Weep not, ah no! it is not meet That tears should now be shed. "God's will be done!" wilt not thou say Ye mourners here below? Wilt thou not chase thy grief away, The tear-drop's deepest flow?

Ah! many now in heathen climes, Where thou hast loved to dwell, Remember well those happy times When thou of God would tell; And when on that loved, heathen shore, Thou bade them all fare .ell,

AND

They wept, lest they should see no more The one they loved so well.

Those trophies of thy early love, Ascend the holy throne ; And angels from bright worlds above Welcome thy spirit home. Freed now from every earthly pain, Thy joys are just begun; Thy life was Christ's thy death was gain, The glorious prize is won.

"Cast thy Bread upon the Waters, and thou Shalt find it after many Days."-Eccl. xi. i.

"Well," says some little boy or girl, "that is a funny way to keep bread, and yet it is in the Bible, so it must be true, I'm sure I can not tell how."

Will you let Auntie Kate tell you, then, that what we call bread is not known in all parts of the world as such. Rice takes the place of bread in many countries; indeed, it is said to be the chief food of one third the human race. It is cultivated in low lands, which are entirely covered with water at some seasons of the year, so that, instead of speaking of winter and summer, as we do. the people talk about the wet season and the dry season. When the waters have run off, and the mud is partially dry, the rice is sown very thickly. Then the water is made to flow over it again, and when the plants are five or six inches high, they are translated so as to be a foot apart each way, and remain covered with water until ripe, when the straw is yellow. In some countries, however, the people go out in boats, and sow the rice literally "upon the waters," and "after many days," that is, at the beginning of the dry season, they reap their harvest.

grow here, so how can I obey the command?" I will tell you how one dear little fellow obeyed it, and peahaps you can then think of many ways in which you can do it.

Frank and Edward attended the same school, and were very nearly of the same One day he came home looking very sadly. His mother noticed the cloud on her boy's usually sunny face, and inquired the cause.

"O mamma," said he, "I don't know what I shall do; it seems as If I never could go to school again;" and his little heart, overcharged with grief, burst out in a flood, of tears, as he hid his face in his mother's
