Is this the man who lately stood Firm as the rock which stems the flood? Is this the man that scaled the skies, Made monarchs tremble with his eyes?

Is it Elijah that I hear, (That man so late devoid of fear,) Desires from duty's path to run, And die before his work is done?

'Tis even so! Lord, what is man? How void of forethought is his plan! A moment's danger hides from view All God hath done, all God can do!

O, Zion! learn that Friend to prize, Who never slumbers, never flies: But, left of him, each long-tried prop Will break, and disappoint thy hope.

Elijah prayed, nor answer found-All selfish prayers must backward bound : Instead of death, the means are sent. That would his heart's desire prevent.

My heart and history's here displayed-Thus oft I've thought, and oft have prayed: When trouble's storm hath round me beat, I've prayed my Lord to say, " Retreat !"

O, coward heart O, spirit vile! To count this holy war a toil; To wish to fly, when Zion's woes Demand my help against her foes!

Lord, keep me from my treacherous heart, Nor let me duty's path desert : Though lined with trouble, it will be The path to honour and to thee!

THE TWINS—A TRUE STORY.

BY REV. JOHN TODD.

A few years since, a man and his wife arrived in the town of M-, N. Y. as permanent resiby a mysterious providence, the young man was called from this world. -With his surviving widow, he left two lovely twin infants, to deplore a loss which time could not retrieve. The widow sought comfort in vain from the limited circle of her acquaintance. There was no minister of the Gospel in that region to direct her to the source of comfort, nor was there a pious friend who could direct her trembling footsteps to the cross of Jesus. But she went to her Bible, and by the assistance of the Spirit of truth, found that consolation which a sulfish world can neither bestow nor taste. She mourned, indeed, a husband who was no more, but she was cheered by the hope that God would protect her and hers. She wept over her innocent babes, and resolved that while she lived, they should never need a mother's care. As they grew up, she endeavoured to teach them the great principles of religion, but they received only her instructions. One week after another rolled away, -one Sabbath after another dawned upon the wilderness, but they brought none of its privilege. The wilderness had never echoed with the sound of the church-going bell. The solitary places had never been gladdened by the sound of the footsteps of him who proclaims glad tidings of great joy. The feeling mother clasped her little boys to her aching bosom, and sighed and wept for the opportunity of taking them by the hand, and leading them up to the courts of of God. In the days of her childhood she had possessed great advantages, and she now mournthat her babes could only receive instruction from her lips. Alas ! no man of God came to instruct,-- to cheer,--to gladden the besom of her who, for years, had never head the whispers of love from the servants of her Saviour. When the little boys were five years old, and before they were old enough to be sensible of their loss, a consumption had fastened upon their tender parent, and she was soon encircled in the cold arms of death. She steadily watched the certain issue of her disease, and even in her last moments commended her children to Him is " a Father to the fatherless." A few moments before she expired, she kissed her little boys, who wept, almost without knowing why, on feeling the last grasp of the clay-cold hand of their mother. " It is hard," said she to a neighbour who was present "it is hard for a mother to leave two such helpless babes without friends, and without any one to protect them; but I leave them in the hands of God, and I do believe he will protect them. My last prayer shall be for my poor destitute orp-
