ON THE DEATH OF MISS AMANDA WRIGHT. BY MISS ELIZABETH WOODWORTH.

'Tis done! 'tis passed! the conflict's o'er, No earthly hand could stay the stroke, No earthly love detain her here, When Christ the welcome mandate spoke.

Consumption marked her for his prey,-That dire, malicious foe of maa-No remedy was left untried, To save her from its venomed fang.

With jealous fear we watched the foe, As with a stealthy step he came-Fondly we hoped to keep her here, But all our anxious care was vain.

Swiftly and surely death approached, And drew his never erring bow, The fatal arrow did its work, And laid our loved Amanda low.

Calmly she viewed her coming end, Without a shudder or a fear, Firmly trusting on His word, Who said, "I will be ever near."

"I know" she said "that I must die, Must struggle with the monster Death, And when a few more suns have set, Must yield to him my fleeting breath."

"But oh! beyond death's lonely vale, There's glory in reserve for me, Gladly I lay me in the grave, With Christ, my loving Lord to be." With glory beaming on her face,

She spoke of loved ones gone before, "There I shall meet them all again, To shed the parting tear no more." The morning dawned, calm and serene,

Its rays dispelled the shades of night, And in that quiet, peaceful hour, Her heaven-born spirit took its flight. Gently she leaned her weary head,

Upon a loving sister's breast-

A moment,—and her raptured soul Had gained the long-sought, promised rest. No fearful spasm shook her frame, No struggle pressed her quivering breath,

But sweetly her young life went out, And softly closed her life in death. Bright blossom, far too fair for earth, Its chilling storms too harsh for thee,

Its ruthless blasts crushed thy fair form, And set thy clay-bound spirit free. How can we give our treasure up To moulder in the silent tomb-How can we tread life's dreary way

Oh God, forgive the bitter tears That flow in torrents from our eyes, Why should we wish Amanda here? Why call her from the upper skies?

Without her smile to cheer its gloom?

Forgive the deep, heart-rending groan. That speaks the grief no words can tell, For her who from our midst has gone On high, in glorious realms to dwell.

Folded in Jesus' loving arms, There safely rest thy lovely dust, 'Til Gabrial's trump the world alarms.

Sleep on, dear cherished one, sleep on,

And when with life we too are done, And lay us down with thee to rest, May we with thee ascend the skies, And share the mausions of the blest. Kingsclear, June 6th, 1860.

A JUBILEE OVER THE TRIUMPHS OF TOBACCO.

A DREAM.

Musing in my office upon the many ills that afflict society, I fell asleep and dreamed. In my dream I was travelling in a country at considerable distance from any human habitation. The road passed along a sarpentine valley, with during the approaching night. Casting my eye to the left, I capied a large opening, and thither I bent my steps. The heavens were in a blaze, and the thunder terrible, as if nature were failing into ruin. At the moment I entered what I found to be the mouth of a large cave, a sheet of commingled rain and hail was poured forth with tremendous fury over the mountains.

Stepping into a winding cavity in the passage I sat down. Looking through a crevice in the rock towards the mouth of the cave, I saw a multitude of strange beings advance, and defile right and left. A terrible blast of a trumpet was given, which was answered from within, and then some one from within also approached. " Have the Prince's vicegerents assembled?" was asked. "Puissant Prince of the power of the air, your ministers are in waiting," was the reply. A being of gigantic stature and ferocious physiognamy then advanced, and after him followed a numerous train. In a few minutes I dared to follow. After procoeding some two or tinued to advance through a spacious winding passage till I came to the Pandemonium of their assembly. This was a large room, very high, having circular seats of rock rising one above the other. On the opposite side, in front, rose a rough, blacd rock-the throne for the chief spirit.
