Unhealthy Effects of Tobacco. Tobacco in any form is not only a narcotic but it is a stimulant also ; it not only blunts the sensibilities, but it goads both mind and body to unnatural activities, and the machine made to run faster than was ever intended, wears out so much the sooner and long before its time, and stops forever! "Doctor, why do you use tobacco so ?" said we a few months since to a physician whom we met on the street, whose whole mouth seemed to be so full of it that he was crunching it as persons do who have a mouthful of water-melon, "I must do it to keep down the pain in my teeth." We never saw him afterwards, and the record of his death reads thus in the American Medical Times : " He suffered from disease of the aortic valves of the heart, leading to dropsical effusion, resulting in mortification of the legs and feet, ending in tetanic symptoms and death." What a fearful concatenation of human maladies : heart disease, dropsy, mortification, and lockjaw! any one of which ailments is enough to des stroy an iron frame. But note: the disease began in the heart, that heart which had been kept in excess of excitement for so many years by the long, steady, and large use of tobacco. With beacon-lights like these shining full in his eyes, the man who persists in the employment of tobacco in any shape or form, and who, to all arguments against its employment, can only reply, "I can't," or "I won't," only confesses himself a moral impotent or a reckless criminal;

for that it is a crime to knowingly persist in practces which are destructive to the body can scarcely be denied.

We Shall be Changed."-Story of the Worm.

BY THE REV. JOHN TODD, D. D.

On one of our autumn days, during what we call our Indian Summer, when the beaver and the muskrat do their last work on their winter homes, when the birds seem to be getting ready to wing themselves away to milder climates, where the sun spreads a wharm haze over all the fields, a little child went out into his father's home-lot.-There he saw a little worm creeping towards a small bush. But he crept slowly and grave! Webster and Douglas used alcohol patiently along, as if he felt that he was a poor, unsightly creature.

"Little worm," said the child, " where are you life-power in advance, by overtaxing the powers going ?"

"I am going to that little bush yonder, and there I am going to weave my shroud and die. beer by the gallon daily, do, by the time they me."

" No, no, little worm ! My father says that out of the finger, and even the puncture of a means."

"Neither do I," says the worm. "But I know, for I feel, that I am dying, and I must hasten and get ready ; so good-bye, little child ! We shall never meet again."

The worm moves on, climbs up the bush, and there weaves a sort of shroud all around himself. There it hangs on the bush, and the little creature dies. The child goes home, and forgets all about it. The cold winter comes, and there hangs the worm, frozen through and through. all dead and buried. Will it ever live again? Will it ever be changed? Who would think it P

The storms, the snows, and the cold of winter go past. The warm, bright spring returns. The buds swell, the bee begins to hum, and the grass to grow green and beautiful.

The little child walks out again, with his father, and says:

"Father, on that little bush hangs the nest or house of a poor little worm. It must be dead now. But you said one day, that such worms would 'be changed.' What did you mean p I don't see any change ?"

"I will show you in a few days." says the father.

He then carefully cuts off the small limb on which the worm hangs, and carries it home. It looks like a little brown ball, or cone, about as large as a robin's egg. The father hangs it up in the warm window of the south room, where the sun may shine on it. The child wonders what it all means? Sure enough, in a few days, hanging in the warm sun, the little tomb begins to swell, and then it bursts open, and out of it comes, not the poor, unsightly worm that was buried in it, but a beautiful butterfly ! How it spreads out its gorgeous wings ! The little child comes into the room, and claps his bands and cries,
