Poetry.

THE HISTORY OF OLD BIGOTRY There is an old gentleman living on earth, A very queer starchy old beau; For though I know not the day of his birth, He was born some ages ago.

His head is quite small, when stripped of his wig The reason of that I'll explain; For, small as it is, 'tis sufficiently big To hold his diminutive brain. WOTANNAU.W

And his heart, you must know, is small as his he The reason of that, too, I'll show; He buttons his coat so closely, indeed, His heart has had no room to grow.

For many long years a stanch Papist was he, Possess'd of a wizard-like spell ; For all who saw not as he chose to see He condemn'd, without mercy, to hell.

And, in order that they might the sooner arrive At the place where he wish'd them to be, He tortured, and rack'd, and burn'd them alive : Such a merciless tyrant was he.

Yet he made, 'tis well known, a won'drous mi take, Like those who murder'd Saint Stephen ;

For Jesus was near their blest spirits to take, And they went all the sooner to heaven.

All the while he as-umed a vile hypecrite's look The dragon appe r'd as a lamb; The cross and the crozier and mitre he took, And he spoke in Immanuel's name.

At length the pure Gospel resplendent arose-He fear'd what would soon him befal-That the light of the truth would his knavery ex-And he should be scouted by all.

So he turn'd him around smid the confusion Of sections, and parties, and creeds; And he sow'd in their bosoms of bitter exclusion And pride the fletestable seeds.

He threw off his fine pontifical dress, And doff'd his tight coat from his back ; had never been taught by her mother to call him before the hot summer days were over, he was "Our Father," nor to feel that if she were ill very restless and tired. "I DON'T KNOW HOW TO PRAY."

One day I went with a kind lady who loves Intle children, to a poor man's house, where there were three little girls, the eldest about ten years old. This child's name was Emma Bell; her parents did not lo e God, and could not teach she is just here :" and told him to go bekind out home." their children to love him ; and, as the lady wagoing away from the town where Emma lived. she wished me to know the child, in order that I might take notice of her, and be kind to her.

We talked to Mrs. Bell about her children, and she said Emma was a very dear child, kind to her little sisters, and always willing to do as she was told ; she had begun to go to Sunday school, loved to go, and often when she came bome said some of the bymns she had learned, and told her mother how nicely her teacher had been speaking to the class, and what she had said. "I eannot think how it is she likes to think about such things," Mrs. Bell said ; " for there is no one here to teach her what is right. I believe if there was she would be a very good child."

God always grants children's prayers why he thought that washing his hands would warmed them, and we chatted about the work she had done at school, and about her reading ; then I asked what she learned at the Sunday school, and it she could tell me who Jesus Christ was, and what he came to this world for. She told me he was God's Son, and that he came to this world to save sinners. Then we talked about the sweet hymn-" Jesus who lives above the sky"-and about God's love in saying that he would forgive all the wicked things we have ever done if we believed in Jesus, and if we asked to be pardoned for the sake of what he had done. "You do pray to God, don't you ?" I said to to God to make everybody more kind to her. She Emma. She did not answer. "You do pray to him, I hope, my dear." She did not speak, but her bright black eyes filled with tears. "Do you not pray to him, Emma ?" " No, ma'am." "What! never ?" " No ma'am,"

She soon gave pleasing evidence that she had God is so kind and loving, that he will grant become a child of God.

"Where did you find the passage ?" " I will show you."

He got the Bible, and read the latter part of the ninth verse of the seventeenth chapter of Job: " He that hatk clean hands shall be stronger and stronger." Jokn was sure his position was a firm one, for it had the support of Scripture. Henry proceeded to explain to him the meaning of the passage, and convinced him that he had taken in a literal sense that which was intended to be understood in a figurative sensethat the passage taught that those who do right shall increase in strength to do right. The truth thus explained made a deep impression upon John's mosd ; and I wish it may make a deep hearts, and make them kind to her, and help her impression upon the mind of the reader.
