THE WIDOW'S ONLY SON.

" MOTHER, I will be every thing to you that] can be; I promise you that."

The boy lifted his head. A look of high resolve made the young brow manlike in expres sion. Not yet had ten summers deepened the gold on those fair locks. The earnest blue eye looked fondly in the faded face that bent over him. There was a world of love in his soul-a love that was not only lip-deep, but was proved by acts of self-denial.

They were poor-that mother and sou - Oh, how poor they were! You could almost see how poverty had drifted over every thing about them -drifted whitely over the pine chairs and tables -drifted over the humble quilt that had grown so faded-orifted over their clothes, and through them, till patch after patch was placed on the sad havoc that pilless, drifting want had made.

But in holy heart-love they were richer than the Rothschilds; yes, out of their bank in heaven-that banh directors here might sneer at -they drew every day, every hour, uncounted treasure.

"Mother, I will be every thing to you that I can be; I promise you that."

The words are beautiful enough to be repeated. Henry Locke smiled, because as he spoke there came tears to his mother's eyes. He had that morning been promised a place in a little country store, five miles from the cot, or rather cabin, where they lived. It was but a small pattance but of late the mother had grown so feeble that she could earn nothing; could scarcely do the little that order and neatness called for at her hands.

One dollar a week ! It was a very little sum, but better, much better, than nothing. Besides. Henry was to have his meals with his employer, and could, if he chose, sleep there. But he did not choose. For a glad smile from mother; for a pressure of that teeble hand; for the tender, Christian words that came from those pale lips, he was bravely willing, after his day's hard work, her hands had trimmed for him. to walk the five miles, dark and tedious though the way was. Often he came bringing some little delicacy that he had earned, and which was sweet to the invalid, because he brought it.

One night the sky was curtained with clouds. The widow looked from her little window facing the hilly road along which the hay-wagons went on their way to the city, and said, as she saw the arm-chair-she should have a new one, easy in AS just received twilight

"Have you put the light in the window?" she asked, suddenly, earnestly, a few moments after "It is growing dark."

Alas! it was not the light that was growing dark.

Her hands grew cold. Over her countenance came that mysterious shadow that falls but once on any mortal face.

" Oh, my boy! my boy!" she whispered : "tell him "-they bent lower to catch the failing words

-" tell him I will put a light in the window of heaven to guide his footsteps there."

The thrilling sentence was hardly spoken, when the shadow dropped from the suffering face, and it smiled in the calm majesty of death.

A funeral followed; humble hearts attended the body of one who was loved for her sincere goodness, all through the hamlet; and on the hillside, in a little graveyard, she was buried.

Not many days after, a great ship came into the port of a busy city. Among those who stepped from her decks, none were more hopeful, more joyous, than young Henry Locke. He had passed through the ordeal of a sea life, so far. unscathed. No blight of immorality had fallen opon him. He had kept himself as spotless as if at every nightfall his feet had been turned toward In Pa ley and French Textures, the door of his mother's cottage.
