THE GREAT DREAMER.

Many of our young readers have read the "Pilgrim's Progress," and many others have heard of that delightful story. Perhaps they would like to hear about the man that wrote it two hundred years ago. If they have read the wonderful dream, they will enjoy a peep at the dreamer; and if not, this peep at John Bunyan may make them wish to learn more about his pilgrim's long rough journey, with its happy end.

Three years after Charles I. came to the British throne, John Bunyan was born at Elstow, a village in Bedfordshire. His parents were poor, and, with a very scanty education, he grew up a great boy, with broad forehead and piercing eye, ever foremost in the rude games of those times, but foremost too in many sins, which caused him much alarm and sorrow in his after life. For the present pleasure of sin is not more certain than the pain that follows hard after. As he grew older he learned his father's trade, that of a tinker, and travelled up and down the country with his tools on his back, ready to do a job of work for any one who had broken things to mend and a few pence to pay.

But when Bunyan was about seventeen years of age he entered the army, for at that time all England was in arms, though not against a foreign foe; and that saddest of wars, civil war, laying the land bare and raising the heart and hand of brother against brother. He was chosen to serve at the seige of Leicester; but when just ready to march for that town, a comrade offered to go instead, and, having taken the place which John Bunyan, should have occupied as sentinel among the beto heaven, or have thy sins and go to hell?"

on him with all our heart, God will forgive us for | imbeciles and lunatics. his sake, and, what is more, treat us as his children and make us holy by his own Spirit. This unexpected message of grace sank down in the soul of the poor tinker, and, though Satan tempted him sadly by whispering, "Leave off seeking to be saved; return to your old ways," the golden chain of heavenly truth and love was too strong to be broken even by the tempter's art, and, as link after link fastened itself round his heart, John Bunyan learned, he tells us himself, to read the Bible with "new eyes," and became a better and happier man. One evening when the day's to:l was ended, the footsore wanderer strayed into a humble meeting where a good pastor was explaining to his flock a verse from God's own word, which told of Christ's love to those he has redeemed. Two simple words fixed themselves in Bunyan's mind, "my love;" and for many days after, as he pondered over the thought that Jesus really loved him, he could not restrain his joy from bursting out into a song. Some time afterwards he was urged to go and tell others about God's message of love, and the people of Bedford flocked by hundreds to hear him. He was now twenty-eight years old, and for five years he labored night and day to do good to his fellow countrymen by pointing out to them the way to be saved.

One winter's evening the fire blazed brightly in a farmer's large comfortable kitchen; one neighbor after another dropped in until the room was crowded, for they expected John Bunyan to be there. But when he arrived, the farmer's face grew sad as he told him he had heard that if they held any more meetings, the constable and his men might perhaps take him away to prison, because very severe laws had been lately passed ed; but Bishop Bonner offered to make him a against those who thus joined together to wor- freeman of the city, and to set him up in buisness, ship God. But John Bunyan was no coward; if he would recant. He answered, "I thank you he began his sermon, and before it was finished, for your offer; but, my lord, I cannot find it in the constable appeared with a warrent or written order for his arrest; and, scarcely allowing the world; for I count all worldly things but loss, in the constable appeared with a warrent or written | my heart to turn from God for the love of the off their beloved teacher to Bedford jail.

This prison stood on the old bridge that spandamp, comfortless cells. For twelve years one of these cells was John Bunyan's home; here he wrote his "Pilgrim's Progress." During those long years his brave wife made many efforts for long years his brave wife made many efforts for lattler, who said, "God be with thee, son will-liam!" EFFECTS OF NOVEL READING.

A tragical affair occurred at Chester on Sunday night. A young man named Davis, from Wales, who was unfortunately bequeathed a legacy, came to Chester to "see life." He fell into loose company, and proceeded with a young woman named Thomson, whom he met there, to Liverpool, where, after some days passed in all sorts of sensual indulgences, re-action set in, and he was haunted indulgences, re-action set in, and he was haunted caps; Purses; Watch Fobs; Mats; Bracelets, &c. Under the influence of this depression he procured a quantity of laudanum, and induced his companion to drink one portion while he took the other. The young woman becoming alarmed, called for assistance, and has recovered; the young man sank under the influence of the poison in the course of the night. The girl was examined on Wednesday. and her statement disclosed a state of maudlin sentiment on the part of both which savoured strongly of an acquaintance with the lowest class of French novels. In one of the letters written by the deceased to bis mother, apprising her of his death by the time she would receive it, he asks her to come and bury them both respectably, according to the rites of the Established Church. The coroner's jury returned a verdict that the deceased had poisoned himself, but that the girl was accessory to his death, and on that finding she was committed for trial.—British paper.

SAD DEVELOPMENT IN THE CAREER OF A YOUNG MAN.-Yesterday another demonstration of the folly of pursuing false pleasure was made in the Tombs Police Court, in the case of a young man engaged as entry-clerk in one of our first houses, whose prospects are represented as having been very promising.
