Beneath the restless sea, Or Earth's deep vaults of wealth are hid For ages yet to be,-So sleep the jewels of God's grace, The diamonds of his love, Amid earth's darkness and its gloom,

Till raised to joys above.

They dazzle not in crowded streets, Nor gleam in gilded halls; They do not give their brightest rays Within high palace walls; We do not see no beauty's brow Their mystic flash always, Nor do they wake in hearts of men Their words of warmest praise; But oft in lowly homes they shine With softest brilliancy, Where God's own spirit deigns to dwell,

And guards them lovingly. What though they gleam unseen below, Or lie in slumbering worth, An eye unseen beholds them all, And loves his gems of earth. Not always 'mid the wrecks of time bhall God's own jewels lie, His own right hand shall gather them To grace his throne on high. There, where the Godhead's brightest ray Fall with effulgent beam, They shall the radience evermore

Reflect with loveliest gleam. Ab, yes! these toils, these prayers, these tears These conflicts of the soul. These stern and angry storms of life That o'er the spirit roll, Shall but refine and polish well Each fond and lovely gem, And mould and fashion it aright For Christ's own diadem. And he stall tell his holy ones How, in earth's gloomy night, He hasted to its awful wreck, And seized his jewels bright. -Nor hern Independent.

Edgar E. Harter; or, the Pernicious Influence of Novel Reading. (Communicated to the Journal of Education, Ca nda, by Rev. Mr. Johnson.)

Edgar E. Harter was born in Herkimer County N. Y., on June 11th, 1841. He was one of eight children. His parents were members of the Dutch Reformed Church. Edgar while is prison bore testimong to the deep-toned piety of uls parents, particulary his mother, whom he never mentioned but in terms of tender affection. They sent him to school and attended strictly to his religious instruction. He proved himself to be a clever youth, and was a general favorite in the neighborhood, as I learned from a memorial in his favor, signed by the principal men of Herkimer, and forwarded to Sir Fenwick Willams, the Administrator of our Government. He was possessed of a superior mechanical genius, and had a strong desire to learn a trade. but never enjoyed the opportunity to do so. He left home about two years ago, and worked in the employment of a maternal uncle named Doxstater, near the village of Watertown. The uncie appears to have been a man of correct habits, and to have treated him with marked kindness. But unfortunately while there he acquired those mental habits which dissipated his religious instruction, and undermined those virtuous principles which he had received in his earlier years.

He formed the acquisintance of several young men of his own age who had cultivated a taste for the light literature of the day. In the present age works of fiction are furnished in a cheap as well as attractive form. Our American neighbors seem to be inundated with them. Large publishing houses in New York and other places are mainly supported by the demand for these pernicious works; booksellers throughout the Union, and I regret to say, throughout Canada too, are engaged in their sale, and the corrupt seed is scattered broadcast over the land. Those young men formed a club to take the New York Ledger, and it was this publication he alleged to me and others, first gave him a disrelish for the Bible and other religious books. Knowing his uncle's aversion to such periodicals, he used to steal away into some secret place, and there greedily devour the contents of the Ledger. In fact, so fascinated did he become with the tales contained in the publication, that he was impatient for the period to arrive when the next number should come to hand. He esteemed the Ledger more than the Word of God, and longed for it more intensely than for his daily bread.

The effect of this new development in his mental and moral nature may easily be surmised. It was impossible that his mind should be so absorbed with anything, and not experience some striking results. By a natural law the moral, as well as the physical man, partakes of the character of the aliments on which it subsists. Educators of youth well understand this principle, and carefully select the books they place in the hands of children. Benevolent men, also, sometimes at a sacrifice, furnish the growing demand for cheap periodical literature, by publishing tracts, magazines, or newspapers of a moral or religious character, by truthful tales and easy sketches, gratifying the taste, and affording an agreeable relaxation from study, without vitiating the mind or endangering the morals of the young.

With respect to the Newl York Ledger, it cannot be disputed that it contains many excellent articles. Some of these would do credit to our paragraphs of vicious character, the periodical of the young cannot be over estimated. All would be generally shunned; it would rank in the classes who have abondoned themselves to the general category of immeral publications. Soon the desire becomes the ruling passion. But I need not detail the incidents connected with this tragedy, already familiar to most readers. Poor Harter paid a terrible penalty for his crime and fully acknowledged the justness of the law which demanded his execution. * * *

The case of Harter teaches an instructive lesson. The young should learn from it to avoid the New York Ledger, and novels in general .-But for the influence of these beautiful works, so far as can be judged by men, Edgar E.
