by looking in his book at recitation. And there they formed their characters; and when they left school, and went to business, they carried with them the same habits. Charley took for his motto: "Business first, and then pleasure;" and he was always applying what he had learned at school to some useful purpose. But James found business as tiresome and distasteful as his studies. He was always intent on amusing himself, and, instead of making his employer's business his own, he was always studying how to do as little as he could and keep his place, and always glad when the store was shut up, that he might seek amusement.

Charley rose rapidly in the esteem and confidence of his employers, and in due time became head clerk, and then partner, and at length he became a wealthy merchant, owning ships and stock in railroads. He was a Director in a Bank and President of a Railroad Company.

But James did not please his employers, and never stay d long at one place. After awhile his father set him up in business; but the same habits followed him. He neglected his business, and spent his time in idle amusements. In a little while he failed. Again his father set him up, and again he failed. And this was repeated till be had spent his estate, which fell to him at his father's death; and, seeing grim poverty stare by the corpse, I asked a neighbour if she was him in the face, he thought of his friend Charley, of whose prosperity he had heard. He determined to go and see if the could not give him something to do.

Charles was very glad to see his old seat-mate, and shook him very cordially by the hand, no seeming to notice the mean appearance of hi garments. After a friendly chat, Charles said to him : "Well, James, is there anything I can d for you?" James hung down his head, and tol him his want of success in business and the strait into which he had been driven, and said he should be very glad of some employment that would giv him a living.

"Well, my good friend," said the merchant "I am glad you have come just at the right time I remember that you and I studied Book-keepin together. I want a book-keeper. The salary i $2,000."

Again James hung down his head, and said "I never understood anything about Book-keep ing when we studied it together, and I have neve been used to it. I can't keep a set of books."

"Well," said Charles, "I recollect that w studied Navigation together. I have a ship tha wants a captain. The salary is $1,800." "O!" replied James, "I never could understand Navigation, and I have forgotten what lit tle I did learn."

"But you studied Surveying. I have a situa tion as civil engineer on a railroad at my disposal The salary is $1,500."

"Indeed," said James, "that is worse yet. never gave my mind to Surveying at school, an-

She replied, "As she lived, so she died ' This was a sad answer. It implied that she died wholly unprepared. How sad to think ; yet how Jan 16 .- pi many there are, who are pursuing a path that will surely conduct them to the same unhappy end. Thousands are now cherishing hope, that, though now neglecting Christ and his claims, intend to accept of offered mercy before death closes the drama of life. But as they live, so they will die. Death will make no change in the soul's condition. True, a Saviour's love is so great that, if the sinner in the last hour of life humbly accepts of Christ and his mercy, he will not deny his prayer for pardon. But there are few such instances of repentance. Many who appear well when death is apparently near, when the danger is past soon forget what manner of persons they were, and go on again in sin. As they live, so they will die. As they die, so they will meet the Judge of quick and dead. Beyond this life there is no probation.

"There are no acts of pardon passed, In the cold grave to which we haste."

Impenitent friend, think before you go farther in that broad frequented road to ruin. Remember as you live, so you will probably die; and as you die, so you will appear at the judgment, and there hear your eternal doom. O, I entreat you, seek now an interest in the dear Redeemer, for as you live, so you will die .- Morning Star.
