in the immediate attention of the Government to such measures as will unite the hearts and hands of the great body of patriotic, loyal and conservative men. It is true the people are disheartened, but they are still strong, and the Government, on the basis of the Constitution only, will be upheld and made victorious over all its fees. It is dangerous in such times as these to suppress inquiry into the acts of Government; it is dangerous to stifle discussion: it is dangerous to create the impression on the public mind that the Government is afraid or unwilling to be subjected to the severest scrutiny. It would be well to re-affirm the resolutions defining the object of the war: to proclaim again the desire of Congress to see all the States returning to their allegiance; to inwoke a revival of ancient friendship between the alienated and hostile sections of a once happy and glorious land, and make the way as clear as possible for the settlement of the contest that is now reaching to the foundations of the Republic itself.
