Her Majesty's Government would be ready to discuss with France and other Powers, by diplomatic correspondence, any specified questions upon which a solution might be attained, and European peace thereby more securely established. But they would feel more apprehension than confidence from the meeting of a Congress of Sovereigns and Ministers without fixed objects, ranging over the map of Europe, and exciting hopes and aspirations which they might find themselves unable to gratify or to quiet.

Nov. 23. M. Drouyn de Lhuys replies that the EMPEROB, "the youngest of Sovereigns," considers he has no right to fix beforehand the programme of the Congress, but he proceeds :-

A deplorable struggle is bathing Poland in blood, is agitating the neighboring States, and threatening the world with the most serious disturbances. concliation the hope of lightening the burden imposed on the nations by the disproportionate armaments occasioned by mutual distrust? Such are, Sir, in our opinion, the principal questions which the Powers would doubtless judge it useful to examine and decide.

Nov. 25. Lord Russell writes a despatch declining the Congress. He asks, is it likely that a Congress could secure better terms for Poland without recourse to arms? The despatch concludes thus :-

Then, moreover, he attributes his poverty to the spoliations of "Piedmont," and thus makes a protest by implication against the kingdom of Italy, which France has recognised. But the clinching argument, which teems with irony and admits of no reply, is that, although the holy father is well aware that the Emperor as the eldest son of the church would be only too hapinvitation to attend a Congress of European Powers | py to pay his expenses, he cannot reconcile it to his ideas of dignity to travel, like the Annamite ambassadors, at the expense of a foreign power.
