Poetry.

REPLY TO AN INFIDEL, WHO ASKED, "WHERE IS YOUR GOD ?" "Where is my God?" O scorner, list, : Whilst I declare to thee,

'Tis by His power thou dost exist, Who dar'st a scorner be.

"Where is my God?" His dwelling-place You azure heavens afford; Veiled though from mortals is his face, He reigns their Sovereign Lord.

"Where is my God?" High tho' He be, With men He deigns to dwell, His eyes our inmost thoughts can see, He weighs our actions well.

"Where is my God?" Heaven is His throne, But yet he stoops in mercy down, To make each heart that seeks His face, Meet temple for His dwelling-place.

"Where is my God?" I hear His voice, Bidding the contrite soul rejoice; For though so great, so lofty, He Prefers the men of low degree.

"Where is my God?" Scorner, no more Repeat th' inquiry as before-View Him above, beneath, around, And in thy breast may He be found! "Where is my God?" Oh! be it thine, To tempt no more His power Divine, But learn on bended knee t' adore

The Being of your doubts before; Embrace His cross, believe His word, And own Him your Redeeming Lord.

From Old Jonathan, A WARNING VOICE,

The mist-class sunlight of a September afternoon was spreading itself over the romantically situated village of Millbrook as it lay in its gold- from the others and apparently very busy with a casten beauty; and it was indeed golden, for the off garment. The superintendant stepped up to him, fields of grain which stood around it, ready for and found he was cutting a small piece out of the the reaper's sickle, the orchards of ripening fruit, patched lining. It proved to be his old jacket, which the thick hedge-rows with their thick clusters of having been replaced by a new one, had been thrown red and purple berries, the plumage of the robin away. There was no time to be lost .- " Come, John, redbreast as he hopped from twig to twig, pour come!" said the superintendant. "What are you ing forth the fulness of his joyous heart in tuneful going to do with that old piece of calico ?" "Please, song-yea, and the very leaves which wandered sir," said John, "I am cutting it out to take with me. through the lanes in a confused and restless man- My dear dead mother put the lining into this old all positions." ner, tossed hither and thither by the autumn breeze, were all tinged with the same golden hue; jacket for me. This was a piece of her dress, and it but, beauteous as was the scene, yet had it been is all I shall have to remember her by !" And as the ton have received by stramers America and Europa, more levely but that sin and death hath dimmed poor boy thought of that dear mother's leve, and of all things earthly. So says the little bell in the the sad death-bed scene in the old garret where she old church belfry which stands so prettily upon died, he covered his face with his hands and sobbed the hill, surrounded by its green turfed graveyard, as if his heart would break! But the train was as it calls the mourners to bring forth their dead, about leaving, and John thrust the little piece of calico and to lay the forms in which their kindred spirits | into his bosom, "to remember his mother by," hurnewspaper in his hand-he gets it sometimes from the Squire, his master, in whose service he has been ever since the death of Mrs. Lethwaitto show me a paragraph which ran something as follows. It was under the head of 'Attempted Suicide,' and stated that on the Tuesday morning preceding the date of the paper, a man had been seen, by the policeman on duty, to throw himself from Blackfriars Bridge, but by the exertions of the officer was saved from drowning, and conveyed to the hospital, where he then lay in a very dangerous state, as he was at the time laboring under delirium tremens. The paper described him as a tall and gentlemanly young man, of about twenty-eight or thirty, whose education was visibly of a superior order, and also that it had been ascertained that his name was Charles Lethwait, and that he was a native of Millbrook. We were both certain from the description that it was the son of John Lethwait, but we never heard whether he died or got better, until a week or two ago we heard of his having been brought to the parish workhouse of Millbrook, just the wreck of his former self. My brother went to see him when he heard of it, and he appeared glad to see him, though it seemed to remind him sorely of his past misconduct, for which he was deeply penitent; but it was too late-but not for God's forgiveness, for none must dare to limit that—but too late to escape the wretchedness he had thrown around himself-too late to honor his worthy father and affectionate mother. Yes, he died a pauper, and was buried as you see."

I left the sexton and the churchyard, and took the way which led me home. I was still surrounded by nature's beauties. By this time the moon was looking o'er the hills, which lent new beauty to the scene. I felt their presence; but still was more present the sorrowful facts of the sexton's tale, and I could not help but ponder them o'er as I thought how be had broken the command, " Honour thy father and thy mother," and in his disobedience had lost the promised earthly blessing.
