For the Religious Intelligencer. THE FAR-OFF LAND. BY WILLIAM C. ATWOOD.

"Twas a calm, still night, when the day was done, When the sun had sank from sight, When the sounds of life had all died away Save the wandering zephyrs gentle play Through the mystic bowers of night.

The stars sailed bright in the ether blue, The moon in the azure sky, And the ocean calm, and the distant hill Reposed in the scene as bright and still As the starry arch on high-

That I wandered forth to a spot retired, From the busy haunts of care; And I sat and thought in a pensive mood Of the beauty of earth and the goodnes of God, Whose impress was visible there.

And I turned my eyes to the heavens above To gaze on the work of His hand, When a voice angelic I seemed to hear, So seraphic and sweet as it fell on my car-"I come from the far-off land !"

"I come, I come, from the far-off land In the silent hour of night, And bring thee news from the absent throng, Whose notes of harmony e'er prolong, Away in their home of light.

"I breathe o'er the flushed and tear-stained check," And the weary eyelids fall, While the sob grows still 'neath the magic spell, And the murmur is hushed as I gently tell Of a rest at last to all.

"Then follow me to the far-off land, Where the summer flowers ne'er decay, Where the autumn winds never mournfully sigh, Nor the winter's blast go rushing by-To the land that is far away.

" I will give thee pinions," the sweet voice said, "That shall bear thee from earth away To the land of purity, peace and love, To the palace of God, to the Eden above, To the realms of endless day." Barrington, N. S., January 12th, 1864.

THE ANGEL CHILD.

One autumn day, in the city of New York, I saw a drunken man on the corner of a certain street trying to make his way along. His face was bloated, his eyes were wild, his clothing dirty and ragged, and his words fifthy and shockingly profane. He reeled this way and that, then stumbled against a post. He started on, staggering a few steps, then lost his balance, and fell headlong into the gutter. Just then I observed a little girl come round the corner above. apparently indifferent, looking at this object and that, until she caught sight of the little crowd that had gathered about the drunken man. She ran in among the rough men and boys standing there and caught sight of the man in the gutter, when suddenly she became very much agitated and looked exceedingly anxious. She bent far over her little form towards the poor wretch, and said in the kindest tones-'Why father! is this you? Are you here, father? Let me help you up.' And she put down her little bands and took hold of the coarse, dirty hand of her father, and tried to help him up. He got up partly, then fell back again. Again he tried, and with the help of the girl, and the post, he managed to get upright on his feet. And the moment he could stand, what did he do? He struck the little girl on her cheek which sent her into the gutter,

She got up quickly, and with both hands brushed away the tears that had started down her cheeks, and said : 'Father, don't strike me any more. I'm your little Emma-I'm your little Emma-don't strike me 'let me lead you home.'

'Are you my Emma?' said the drunken man, 'I thought,' he continued, 'you were one of those Rowland children who are always bothering me. Here's my hand,' he said, 'l'll go home with you.' And he now and then, and the aid of his little child. But look at the little gil! No shoes or stockings, and her bare feet met the hard, cold pavement. The little dress she were was hardly worth the name, for no bonnet or hat either, and her hair hung loosely and the little slender thing shivered and trembled in | planation. the chilly wind of autumn. She was a drankard's heart in that little wretched body. There was a like yet heroic deed.

Just then some little girls about her size and age, came down the walk in high gice. Their appearance indicated that they had comfortable homes and wealthy parents, for they were warmly and richly clad. They noticed little Emma and her drunken father, and gazed at them a moment, and then with a laugh and a sneer too cruel and wicked for children, they ran along.

By all that had happened, perhaps by his own thoughts, the poor man was overcome. He wept like a child. Some powerful impression had been made upon him and he was almost sobered. I took pains to follow the forlorn child and her wretched father so as to find out where they lived.

I do well to call her the "angel child," for her mission, though short, was one of mercy and love, and it was fully accomplished. The power of Christ's kingdom was exhibited in her when she proved strong enough to lead her drunken father to the feet of Jesus. Of this work she sowed the seed, but did not live to behold the harvest. She went before her father, who, from the hour of her death strove to live so that he might meet his child in heaven.

GROWING RICH.

"Your nephew, Felix Graham, is growing rich, I hear," said my neighbor Jones as he carried me to the depot, whence I was to start for my sister's son's. "Perhaps so," was my brief reply. "I do not know the state of his finances."

"There is no doubt of it, I should think," he rejoined. "My brother met him last winter at the city savings bank, and saw him deposit a thousand dollars as the net gain of his farming the past year. I hear he is driving a great business this summer, and he will probably have another pile for investment when January comes round again. But you are going there, and will see for yourself; so, good-bye."

I had not visited Felix for four or five years; but having sent notice of my intention to go there by the early morning train, I was a little disappointed, on my arrival at the "Cross Roads" (which was the nearest station to his dwelling, and about two miles distant,) not to see the horse and chaise. However, there was a decent conveyance called the Grahamville express, which would take me almost to my nephew's door; and so I went along. The driver knew me, for the village had been my home before my marriage and removal to the city; and he too spoke of Felix Graham as a man to be envied for his steady and grow-

"I hope to find him well, then," I said. When I missed bim and the black pony at the depot, I feared something was the matter."

" Ab, he was too busy to leave, I suspect. When a man has made up his mind to be rich, he can't stop for trifles, you know." And the expressman laughed as if the joke was as rich as the subject of it, and perhaps it was. My nephew's daughters met me as the waggon stopped, and welcomed me most heartily. Jane and Lucy were sensible girls fast growing to womanhood. Taking my bag and bandbox in their arms, they escorted me to the house; and then leaving me to the cordial greetings of their mother, they went back for my trunk.

"That is too heavy for the girls," I said, rising hastily to prevent it. But Mrs. Graham held me back. "Felix expects us to manage such little matters," she replied. 'He and the men are so busy always, and their time is worth so much more than ours,' she added apologetically.

I did not meet my nephew till supper was on the able. "Glad to see you, Aunt Lois," he said as he shook my hand furiously, and hastened to take his seat. "I suppose you expected me at the depot, but this is my cocumber barvest, and every hour is worth so much gold to me. I shall get twenty-five cents for every cucumber I can send to market this week, and that will count up the money fast." The complaent, self-satisfied smile with which this was said, was a revelation to me.

"Have you read Mrs. --- 's last volume ?" I inpoired of Jennie, as she sat for a few moments in my chamber that evening.

"I have hardly seen a book since I left school two years since," was the reply. " Father says be cannot afford to buy them, and Lucy and I are too constanty occupied through the day, and too weary in the evening, to read much if we had them." The sigh / NAMARINDS-Just received-One Barrel Tamarinds. which followed Jennie's explanation went to my heart, for I knew how she loved to read and study when I saw her in her childhood.

"You are working too hard," I said to my neany more, will you, father? Come, father,' she added, phew's wife, as I followed her through the round of teil from Tuesday to Thursday. "With so many hired men to cook for and such a dairy to tend, you need a stouter frame and stronger arms than you or Monday morning my visit was completed and I started for home. Felix accompanied me to the depot, having business in that direction. When we reached the cars, a pale and feeble soldier, who had lost a leg in his country's service, solicited help. My nephew turned a deaf ear to the moving appeal, his whispered apology to me being the two facts that "he wanted to lay up $1200 this year,' and that " really government ought to take care of their soldiers."

When I reached my home I sat down and wept; and though I did not explain the mafter to my neighbor Jones, who came to meet me, I did say to myself, liver complaint, with which I was laid up prostrate, and and I tell it in confidence, dear reader, to you, that for me, I made my way to a back and filthy street, It is my opinion Felix Graham is growing miserably
