"Look not upon the wine when it is red."-PROV. 23: 31. Look not upon the wine when red And sparkling in the cup of woe; Oceans of sorrow it has fed

Since first its tide began to flow.

Its streams, though they appear so bright, Have millions lured to death and hell; Oh! put temptation from thy sight, Fly swiftly from the magic spell!

Each drop received within thy veins Will circulate with deadly power, Fill thee with agonizing pain, And sting thee in the dying hour.

It is not weakness to abstain; Heroes have braved its poisonous breath, But in the contest have been slain And now bestrew its shores of death.

Look not upon the wine when red; Let millions slain thy soul alarm; Lost bacchanalians from the dead Shriek forth, "Avoid its fatal charm !"

Many and many a time Murray Cooper had warned his room-mate against his folly, but Allan only laughed, and went on his way. So Murray ceased his words, but still remained Allan's fast friend, hoping that example might do what entreaty could not. All the evening Murray sat at his book, digging away at the old Greek verbs.
