"NOT AS I WILL," O Father, I have prayed for strength, For summer-tide of joy, That longest hours and sunny days I might for Thee employ;

And, lo! I was but weak and faint, And early winter came : It is Thy will, Thy will be done, And blessed be Thy name.

I thought to rear a temple dome Where men might worship Thee; I look upon Thy captives, Lord,

And hope to set them free. Thy temple walls are fair and high, Without a touch of mine, Thy children walk at liberty,

And the victor's hand was Thine.

I would have spoken mighty words, I would have done great deeds, And bravely 'neath Thy banner fought For all Thy people's needs;

But Thou hast given me feeble lips, And hands that must be still, Thou bidd'st me rest while others serve,-O Master! do Thy will.

I turn me from the sacred cup With sorrow's leaves made strong, And in the starless night of gloom I cry, O Lord! how long? But firmer still this cry shall be;

O Fathor! heed not me, -Not as I will, but as Thou wilt, Choose Thou my work for me. Thy will be done. O God of light!

We are in darkness still, 'Tis well that we, the weak, the sad, Should wait upon Thy will. Yet let Thy kingdom come, O God!

That all Thy love may see, And those who weep in pain and loss Be comforted by Thee.

The time passed slowly, for Mary's heart ached with fears she could bardly define, for her husband's hours of coming home had been strangely irregular of late. Five years later, during which period great changes had taken place, Mary's parents were both lying in the "gentle valley." Mr. Lyon and his family occupied a very miserable dwelling in the outthe intemperate and gambling habits of the husband and father. His downward course had been very rapid-first, owing to a constant use of wine, several ruinous mistakes, then a total neglect of business, and at last a resort to gambling to repair his ruined fortunes. All these causes produced serious consequences, till starvation was almost the everpresent fear in the heart of Mary. Two sweet children now called her mother, and for them she desired

It was the night before Christmas. A deep suow had fallen. Large piles were drifted about the door and against the windows of the poor habitation.
