THE COURSE OF LIFE. O ! let the soul its slumber break, Arouse its senses and awake, To see how soon Life, with its glories, glides away,

And the stern footsteps of decay Come stealing on. How pleasure, like the passing wind, Blows by, and leaves us nought behind But grief at last; How still our present happiness Seems, to the wayward fancy, less Than what is past.

And while we eye the rolling tide Down with our flying minutes glide Away so fast, Let us the present hour employ, And dream each future dream of joy

Already past. Let no vain hope deceive the mind; No happier let us hope to find To-morrow than to-day. Our gilded dreams of yore were bright-Like them the present shall delight,

Like them decay.

Our lives like hastening streams must be, That into one engulfing sea Are doomed to fall-The sea of death, whose waves roll on,

O'er king and kingdom, crown and throne, And swallow all. Alike the river's lordly tide, Alike the humble riv'lets glide To that sad wave :

Death levels poverty and pride, And rich and poor sleep side by side Within the grave. Our birth is but a starting place; Life is the running of the race,

- And death the goal: There all our steps at last are brought That path alone, of all unsought, Is found of all.

Long ere the damps of death can blight, The cheek's pure glow of red and white Hath passed away : Youth smiled, and all was heavenly fair; Age came and laid his finger there-

And where are they? Where is the strength that mocked decay, The step that rose so light and gay, The heart's blithe tone? The strength is gone, the step is slow,

And joy grows weariness and woe When age comes on. Say, then, how poor and little worth

Are all those glittering toys of earth That lure us here-Dreams of sleep that death must break! Alas! before it bids us wake, Ye disappear.

THE TEMPERANCE PLEDGE, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

"Is your time most up, Mr. Sandford?" said Mr. Salisbury to a young man, as they walked along the he would gladly have turned away, but not one was street-one summer afternoon. "Most up," replied Mr. Sandford, "only three days and I shall be free."

"You shall be free to do as you choose, of course," continued the first speaker; "but by all means you to come to this place of woe. The strange sight vawill sign the pledge again, won't you, and this time for life, instead of only for a few months?"

answer. "It has been a year since I have touched, tasted, or handled the fascinating cup, and I think I am sufficiently strong to let it alone without a pledge.

hour was roaming over the unexplored regions of dream-land. As he wandered leisurely along, he came to a large and exceedingly beautiful mansion. At printed in large letters:

At the right of the door he saw a lovely maiden dressed in pure white, beckoning him away from the mansion and pointing to a fountain of sparkling wa- seeing another name in the back of his Bible, just beter playing in the distance. walked in with several handsome and gaily dressed young persons. "Splendid," "beautiful," "magnificent," they all exclaimed as they stepped into the vast vestibule. They could stay here only a minute, for others coming in pressed them along, so, opening a door, they passed into a very large parlor, richly furnished. The floors were beautifully carpeted. Here and there were rich sofas, and marble-top tables loaded with refreshments. The sunlight came streaming in at the windows of stained glass, in all the colors of the rainbow. All things seemed attrac-

Mr. Sandford had no sooner seated himself upon a sofa to rest than a little maid came to him with a glass of wine. He drank it and felt refreshed. It was thus with all the company, and they said, "I am sure I see no harm in being here." They seemed very happy, talking, laughing, singing, and dancing. They only thought of what a beautiful place that was, and how pleasant it was to enjoy the gay society of their friends and acquantances. Once or twice a day a glass of wine was furnished, which cheered for the present and prepared them for the new pleasure of the hour. Soon Mr. Sandford wished for wine more frequently than it could be obtained in this room, so he passed into another one nearly as large and almost as well furnished. Many of his companions went with him, so he was not among strangers. Here he found his own loved Anna Weston. They were delighted to see each other again, and here their nuptials were celebrated in all the display of a feast of wine. But wine soon proved insufficient for such an occasion, and as nothing stronger could be obtained there, they passed on where whisky in its milder forms was served at intervals through the day. This room was much inferior to the last. There was no carpet on the floor. . Some of the wir.dow-panes were broken, and the furniture was only ordinary. There was less happiness and laughter, more wrangling and disappointment. They lingered here some time, then with many others entered another apartment, positively gloomy, where they could be supplied with any intoxicating drink as frequently as they desired. Here their eyes were opened to the true character of the place. It was no longer a beautiful mansion, but a dismal hovel, full of deception and wretchedness. Now they perceived that they had been bartering all the interests of life for these transient enjoyments. When they first entered the so-called mansion, it was in all the beauty of youth; now their eyes were bloodshot, their noses vered with burning sores. Joy was outweighed by sorrow. Their clothes were soiled, tattered, and torn, and they rushed to the side-board for liquor, that they might forget their personal appearance and their degradation.

noise, as of fermentation, which explained to them the cause of their present perilous situation. "Liquor has done it," they all exclaimed; "come, let us go back," and they started towards the door, but it would not open sufficiently to allow any to go back, though others were coming in continually. There was anothor door, however, resembling those in the rooms through which they had passed, opening out upon fair gardens and paths leading to the pearly fountain. These doors were closed, and this one was so securely fastened they made no effort to remove the heavy bolts. There was no way of retreat. Mr. Sandford and his wife began to realize the full danger of their position. Poor drunkards, their beauty all gone, their health destroyed, their minds impaired, and their prospects ruined. Poor souls! They made a sad mistake when they crossed the threshhold of that large mansion. To prevent thoughts of former happiness and present misery from haunting them they kept a living stream of fiery liquid running down their throats, but this only made their condition worse. They were rudely pushed into the next room, which was so small they could scarcely move. Here liquor was denied them. The air was close, and all was dark. Suddenly the ceiling above was as white as the light. Each one looked up involuntarily and saw a sight from which able to withdraw his gaze. In this awful moment they all reviewed their lives, remembered rejected warnings and lost opportunities, but were especially pained by the remembrance of those innocent, unexperienced and wavering ones whom they had induced nished, and with the darkness came a wail of sorrow from each burdened heart. This was followed by a moment more dreadful, more terrible still. A loud, "I don't know as I shall sign it at all," was the hoarse creaking voice uttered in harsh tones, "The devil's home is the drunkard's hell." In their despair they called wildly for belp, but it was of no avail. The floor fell through, while underneath was the bottomless pit. "Save me-save me! God of I do not like to be bound. I want to feel that I can heaven save! Oh! it is too late, too late!" they cried, as they felt themselves going down, down, down into the unfathomable abyss.

At this moment Mr Sandford awoke. The pale ight of the moon enabled him to see that he was in his own room, on his own bed. The wine glass by Do not wait till the three days are over; be on the his bedside he had dashed to the floor. There he lay with great drops of perspiration on his brow, shuddering still as he remembered his dream. Soon he arose, and, seeing no scrap of paper near by, he took his Bible from the shell, where it had lain un-"No, no, not now," replied Mr. Sandford. "I touched for many months, and taking a pencil from of his Bible a life long pledge of total abstinenc. Below his name he wrote, "May God help me to keep When they separated, Mr. Salisbury went home, this pledge." He opened his long-closed Bible in trying to invent some plan to save his friend from another place and tried to read, but it was scarcely light enough, so he again lay his head upon his pil low, thanking God that he was not in the position he hought he was a short time before. Sleep visited him no more that night. He arose with the early Salisbury's words: "Something to fall back upon; dawn a new man. Old things had passed away, and

As soon as Mr. Salisbury read it, he knelt down and thanked God that he had heard his prayer, and saved a soul from death. They had a pleasant interview, and Mr. Sandford was encouraged least it appeared so to him. Over the door was and strengthened to press forward in the way of duty. He overcame many difficulties and persuaded several to sign the pledge. He kindly requested Miss Weston to unite her influence with his, but she refused.
