

How gently do these tiny waves Creep up and kiss the smiling shore, And murmur in the hollow caves Their tales repeated o'er and o'er!

Yet yesterday, with might and main, They lashed the caves and smiling shore, And, beaten back, returned again, And grew in fury more and more.

How can the shore forgive the shock Which yesterday so rudely came? How dare the waves now meet the rock Without a sign of fear or shame ?

So yesterday I saw an oak Lose half its branches in the storm, And, bent and broken by the stroke," Come out a maimed and shattered form.

Yet come the winds to-day and sigh Like lovers round the widowed tree ; They whisper to it as they fly, And it doth answer tenderly

How can the oak so soon forgive, So soon forget its bleeding pores ? How can the limbs that wounded live Caress the winds that made their sores ?

I wounded once the dearest heart That ever clave unto my own ; Its love I madly thrust apart And shut it from my heart of stone.

I thrust away the sweetest vine That ever clung to mortal breast ; Forbade it round my life to twine, And tore its tendrils from their rest.

That wounded heart came back to me-Forgiving all its wounds and tears ; The vine yet clings unto its tree, And shares the storms of passing years. J. H. M.

Miscellaneous.

TWO WAYS OF TELLING AN UNTRUTH, The children were out on the lawn, having a nict game of croquet, and Miss Alston, their new govern ness, sat at the library window with a book in hel hand ; but her glance wandered from it constantly t the merry group who were playing below. It had for his usual sport of pretending to be chased by a chief thought at present was to become acquainte | with the character of each one of her pupils, to learn each special disposition, and find out the chief excellence and the princpal fault of each, that she might understand how best to train them for their career 11 life, and especially for the service of the Master whot she herself delighted to honor. She watched them closely, therefore, without seen a ing to do so at their work and at their play ; and it was in such unguarded hours as this present, the temperaments.

serve ? What is the difference between a falsehood acted and one spoken ? Do you think God sees any difference ?" Miss Alston looked very grave and sad, and Margie could stand it no longer. She burst into tears, and sobbed out, "Oh, Miss Alson, don't look that way, please. I can't bear it. I know it was very wrong to deceive you, and very mean to prices, to make a thorough clearance. take praise which 1 had not earned. But I didn't think it was quite as bad as really telling a lie. I see now it is, and indeed I will never do it again, if you will only promise to trust me."

Miss Alston could not resist the earnest pleading of one so truly penitent as Margie seemed to be. She drew the weeping girl to her side, and talked to her of the importance of truthfulness in act as well as word, and told her how God hates a lie, that none of us are free from the temptation to waver at times from the exact truth, and how by God's grace and help alone are we enabled to resist it. And begging her to seek this help constantly in humble prayer, she promisel once more to place entire confidence in her pupil until she should forfeit it again. Let us hope that she never did; but are all my young readers sure that they are never untruthful in act as well as in word ?

BREAD AND MILK,

The incident I am about to relate I received from the lips of the principal actor when he was a venerable and most interesting gentleman. It is a story of his wayward boyhood, which he loved to tell, because it reflected honor upon a mother he delighted to honor.

One morning, Johnny-for that was his real name -came to the breakfast-table, and boldly asserted that he would not eat bread and milk that morning. "Very well, Johnny," answer d his mother quietly, and without raising her voice. "I'll set it on this high shelf. You can run off to school."

This run consisted in a long piece of road, and then a long tramp through a piece of wood, which gave Johnny ample time to call up all his spirits, and to strengthen his determination not to give in. Accordingly, on his return, he was all ready to assert the dignity of his boyhood; and when he drew up to the table and saw the bread and milk set before him, he felt nerved to any desperate act, and decided to die rather than eat it.

" Very well, Johnny," was his mother's calm remark. "I'll set it on the high shelf till you want it;" and a decided wave of the hand sent him from the table, and in due time he was bidden by an au. thority he could not resist to run off to school. That run was not so spirited as the morning one
