From the New York Observer. "I HATED LIFE." Eccl. 2: 17.

ET MISS CARRIE A. SPAULDING. I looked upon its sadness and its sorrow; Its hidden snares; Its days of darkness, with no brighter morrow; Its fields of tares.

Its earthly hopes, in broken fragments ending; Its drooping flowers; Its sudden griefs our very heart-strings rending; Its wasted powers.

Its noblest aims, and earnest, strong endeavor, All made in vain; Its clinging to the broken reeds, which never Bring aught but pain.

Harsh judgments, founded on some plea of duty, And words of scorn, Crushing from life its hopefulness and beauty, With piercing thorn.

I heard its flatteries turned to strange reviling; Its idols, clay-Temptation, with its specious, smooth beguiling, Leading astray.

I saw the sunbeams that illume the morning In darkness fade; The brightest gems an earthly lot adorning In "caskets" laid.

I hated life.

And, looking on its worthless, fading pleasures; Its days of strife; Its cups of bitterness, and tarnished treasures,

And then a voice, with gentle, touching sadness, Fell on my ear: Hast thou forgotten all the days of gladness That greet thee here?

The loving hearts that, with their sweet endearing, Circle thee round? The pitying tears, and words of hope cheering, When cares abound?

Dost thou not see thy withering, fading flowers Blooming anew, Fresh with the perfume of the heavenly bowers, In radiant hue?

If broken reeds fail in the hour of trial, Then lean on Me; If earthly prayers meet with a strange denial, 'Tis best for thee.

The beauty of each mountain, rock and river, Each flower-wreathed spot, Should waken grateful praises to the Giver, For such a lot.

Beyond thy cloud there is the "silver lining;" Raise but thine eyes, And, lo! in dazzling glory, sunbeams shining Light up the skies.

Go forth, then, to the plenteous harvests whitening With heart of cheer; And shadows, in thy Master's service brightening, Shall disappear.

' Who is Albert?'

He was the son of a governor, and wealth, influence, position, and a lovely wife were his dower at the age of twenty-two; but alas! in that aristocratic Frederick, surnamed "Old Fritz." A man cannot mansion where the marble side-board was loaded always be working hard; he must have some leisure with massive silver goblets, he acquired the taste for and recreation; and, perhaps, of all working-men, wine, which proved his ruin.

Albert comprehended his dangerous situation at a glance, and catching a plank from a pile of lumber, MAPLE SUGAR AND HONEY. -500 lbs Maple Sugar 10 gallons Maple Honey, very nice. ran to his assistance. He was at length rescued, and

Albert hurried away, having conquered his third temptation; he had done good to one who had 'despitefully used and persecuted him.'

As he went to replace the plank, a pocket-book caught his eye. He quickly grasped it, and looked around to see if any one was watching him; but all were too busy helping the half-drowned boy towards home, and he slipped the treasure into his pocket and hurried on. As soon as he thought himself secure he opened it, and a number of bills and some smaller currency met his gaze.

Food, clothing, and fuel; oh! bow much good the money would do! But conscience again whispered in his ear; this time the words of the commandment, 'Thou shalt not covet !' Slowly Albert closed the pocket-book, and going to the office of the chief of owner; and thus conquered his fourth and last temptation for that day.

Now, people do receive a reward for every good deed. Sometimes the reward quickly follows the act; again it is long delayed; but sooner or later, it is sure to come, for God is just.

Albert turned slowly homeward, he was hungry, but he felt, even then, that the pangs of hunger were not half so hard to bear as the sharp sting of remorse and the crushing agony of a guilty soul would have

Nearly a week had passed since the occurrence related above, when a gentleman called whom Albert recognized as the rabbit owner that he saw on the ice. After a few moments conversation, he engaged Albert as clerk in his store, at a salary sufficient to support himself and his mother.

Albert was quite as much surprised as overjoyed at his good fortune; and his surprise was in no way diminished when the merchant said:

'Your conduct on the ice last week procured the situation. I saw more than you supposed. You were sorely tempted, but nobly resisted; and I have no doubt of your ability to conquer all the difficulties of life and carve out a glorious future; for he that overcometh evil in his own heart is nobler than a king. And so the sequel proved, and Albert's temptation, bravely conquered, were the stepping stones to wealth and greatness.

THE CONTENTED PEASANT.

In Prussia, far away from the streets, houses, palaces, churches, and noise of hurrying crowds, with the horse's tramp and the rattling of wheels, a peasant lad once lived in the humble home of his father and mother, who, though poor, still cared for him, doing the best they could, considering their scant means. Carl, for so the peasant lad was named, had | Wall and Varnish Brushes; 1000 bushels OATS; 12 tons two sisters, and with these he passed his childhood | FEEd; 30 qtls Codfish; 5 brls and 5 half-brls SHAD; -30 and boyhood, hearing but little, and caring less, about the honors and riches which excite the ambitious in royal cities; while he revelled in the romantic scenery of his native village, whose upland slopes were covered with the luxurious vine, thriving under the influence of genial showers, warm sunshine, and the pure breezes that swept over the hills and forests that encircled Carl's dwelling.

The peasant lad grew, became a man, a husband, and a father. More than this, Carl became a Christian.
