SHALL WE ALL BE THERE?

BY MARILLA.

When the sunlight comes back from her grave in the west,
And throws o'er the hill side the tint I love best,
When all the wild roses in diamonds are dressed,
And their perfume falls sweet on the air;
I think of the mountains of paradise-land
Where the sweet gales of Eden their beauties have fanned,
And Christ is the sunlight and joy of the land;
Shall we all—yes, all—be there?

When twilight is glowing with crimson and gold,
Which seems but the gateway to treasures untold,
When the lambs from the pasture are brought to the fold
Where they rest in the good shepherd's care;
I think of the Shepherd so tender in love,
Who, when the long twilight of life shall remove,
Will gather his flock in the fold of his love;
Shall we all—yes, all—be there?

When wild, angry storm-clouds are robed in a frown,
As night spreads her mantle of darkness around,
And cheerless and lonely the rain cometh down,
Like tear-drops of bitter despair;
I think of the city where tears never flow,
Where night never shroudeth the heart in its woe,
Where sorrow and sickness they never shall know;
Shall we all—yes, all—be there?

Will the dawn of Eternity bring to our ear
Such music as only the ransomed shall hear?
Will the bright starry crowns of the glorified sphere
Be the diadems we shall wear?
When thy jewels are gathered, O Father Divine,
May we, through the love of our Saviour, be thine,
And when in thy mansions the blessed shall shine,
May we all—yes, all—be there.

SUNSHINY SAM.

At first sight no one would have thought that little Sam Berry could be happy. He had neither father nor mother, sister nor brother, and no friend but the old woman who took care of him. He was often cold and hungry, suffered pain day by day, and never could play as other children did, for his poor little legs were very weak, and the hump on his back was very heavy which he must always carry. Many people older than Sam would have thought their life a very hard one, and complain a great deal, for which no one would have blamed them. But Sam seemed to enjoy life immensely, and never complained; and every morning, no matter whether it was fair or stormy, the little cripple looked out of his window, saying, with a contented smile, 'O pretty day!'

He was only ten years old, yet could not remember a time when the 'ache wasn't in his back;' for he had fallen off a shed when he was a little baby, and been so badly hurt that he never could get over it. A kind lady took pity on him when his mother died, and got an old woman to take care of him. But by and by, the kind lady went away, and then old Beccy had to get on as she could; for, though very poor, she could not desert little Sam. She lived in a small room high up in a house full of other poor people, and took in washing for a living. All day long she scrubbed, or ironed at her table before one window; and all day long Sam sat at his table before the other window, making furniture out of bits of wood a kind carpenter gave him. With his knife, a few tacks and a glue-pot, he put together little tables and chairs; and now and then when he could afford it, he painted them in the most brilliant colors. An apple woman who lived in the next room sold these for him, and when he had earned a dollar, he felt as rich as a banker, and planned to buy all sorts of splendid things with it. But it always had to go for food or fire, clothes or rent, though Beccy hated to take it. Sam never grumbled about this, and gave up his pennies, saying how glad he was to help; but I fancy some patient tears fell on the funny little chairs he made, and a few natural sighs got put away in the tiny table drawers. No one saw or heard them; but I am sure they were not lost, for children discovered a peculiar charm in those toys of his; and the first time I saw the neat tables and chairs, with the funny daubs of blue and yellow on them, I found something in them so touching that I could not rest until I had seen their little maker.

I took my small nephew with me, proudly bearing a paint box and a Noah's ark as offerings to the 'poor broken boy,' as he called Sam, after hearing the story. We went prepared to pity; but there was no need of pity, for we had found Sam perched up at his table, whistling like a blackbird, as he whistled, glued and colored, with his chips and tools about him.

All the sunshine in the room seemed to have settled on his little red hair and happy face, and when we gave our gifts—for I gave some gay bits of stuff to upholster his furniture with—he laughed out so joyously that we forgot there was such things as pain and poverty in the room.

'There ain't nothing in the world you'd like better than than that, is there, Sammy?' said Becky, as the boy hugged the paint box.

'Only one thing I'd like better, you know, Beck; and I'll get that some day, if I wait.'

As he spoke, Sam looked at Freddy's sturdy little body, blooming face, and chubby hands with a wistful expression, which made Becky slap her iron down, and walk away. I understood it; but innocent Freddy asked, with the air of one able and ready to give everything. 'What do you like better? Say?

'To be like you!' and Sam softly passed his thin hand up and down the blue jacket that lay so smoothly over his little friend's straight shoulders.

With a sweet instinct of kindness which is true courtesy, Freddy smiled and answered with a look of respectful admiration at the red tables and yellow chairs, 'I wish I could make splendid things as you do.'

The shadow passed from Sammy's face like a cloud from before the sun, and he proceeded to explain the mysteries of his trade with a comical air of importance, which impressed Freddy with redoubled respect. While the children chatted and laughed together, Becky told me about the child.

'He never frets ma'am; but that crooked back of his is a great trouble to him; and for years he has never forgotten to say in his prayers—'Please God, make me straight sometime!'

'That patient prayer surely will be answered,' I said, trying to speak hopefully.

'Not in this world ma'am. There's no help for him here, and he knows it, but he's willing to wait, and get sweeter and patienter every day,' answered Becky, spoiling a polished wristband with the great tear that dropped on her work.

I turned to the children, who were discussing the ark as they sorted the animals.

'We play be the creatures at home, and I'am always the affalunt,' said Freddy, promenading two green elephants over the ridge-pole of the ark, as no proper door-way is ever to be found in this pleasing toy.

'I should be a camel, because I've got a hump on my back, as he has,' answered Sammy, picking out a purple camel, and surveying it with interest. 'I wonder if he likes it!' he added, after patting the yellow haunch on the wooden beast which, by the the way, looking more like an ostrich than anything else.

'Course he does; God made him so; and he's good and lets folks ride on him, and has lots of stomachs, and goes in hot sand, and I saw one at a manygerry!' cried Freddy, jumbling religion and natural history and menageries all into one sentence.

'Yes, I know; but I wasn't made so, and I don't like it. Well, my soul's straight if my back isn't There aint sheds in heaven Beccy says, so I cant hurt my new back when I get it, and Sammy smiled and nodded with a happy, confident air, which caused Freddy to open his big eyes and look rather bewildered.

We did not stay long this day; but after that first visit, we often met again, for both Freddy and I found that it did us good; so whenever we got fretful or discontented, we would say, 'Let's go Berrying,' which meant a visit to little Sam Berry. He gave us more than we did him; for he was so happy with his little, that we were ashamed to be unhappy with much. Freddy felt this, and never went without something for Sam. Funny presents they were, but nothing came amiss; and Sam rejoiced as gratefully over a red apple or a gingerbread pig, as many people do over silver and gold. Two of his presents were very precious to him. A tin house with a hole in the chimney for the money to go in, was one; and here he kept his earnings, for Becky didn't need them any more. It was a pleasant thing to see Sam drop in a penny, squint down the chimney to be sure it arrived all right, and then listen to the rich-sounding chink of the money, as he rattled the house, and whispered to me with a face full of triumphant satisfaction, 'I'm going to buy something splendid for Becky, when I get enough. Don't you ever tell.'

The other pet was a kneeling Samuel, made of plaster, which Freddy had thought an appropriate gift.

'He says his prayers, and his name is Sammy, so he's like you, and I got him to stand upon your shelf,' said Freddy presenting the image.

'He's prettier than I am. Maybe I'll look like this when I get straight; I think angels look so. What lots of nice things you give me;' and Sam leaned out his high chair to thank his friend with a kiss, after which he arranged the image on the shelf, with a gorgeous parrot, a blue mug holding some marigolds, and the ark to keep it company.

All that winter we knew and loved 'Sunshiny Sam,' as we called him, and our favorite plan was to take him into the country with us in the spring. We often used to talk it over with him, and laughed when he hopped about, clapping his hands at the idea of sheep picking dandelions, and riding in a wheelbarrow. It made him very happy though it never came to pass, for when spring arrived little Sammy had gone away into a lovely country with better friends than we were. When Becky came to tell us that he would never welcome us any more, I thought Freddy's heart would break; but when he saw his little friend quietly asleep, free from pain at last, he seemed to understand, without words, the beautiful and happy change which had befallen his playmate.

'He's well now, so I shant cry any more, said Freddy, softly, as he laid his flowers about the familiar face, which did not smile upon him for the first time since he had known it.

There are many little Sams in the world, and it is good to know them; for beautiful lessons may be learned of those straight souls in crooked bodies; and lookers-on may learn of such the happy secret which makes sunshine even in shady places.

BRUCE AND BRAVO.—Sometimes, when a boy has quarrelled with his companions, you will see him rejoicing in any misfortune that may befall the other. When Robbie missed in the spelling class, what a smile of wicked pleasure stole up into Charley's eyes! and when Charley broke his skate on the mill-pond, Robbie looked as if he did not feel very sorry for it. He did not even run to help Charley up when he fell so hard on the ice, just because his heart was so full of naughty, unforgiving thoughts. Ah, that would be a dreadful spirit to have when you knelt down to ask God to "forgive your trespasses as you forgive those who trespassed against you."

One day a fine Newfoundland dog and a mastiff had a sharp discussion over a bone, or some other trifling matter, and warred away as angrily as two boys. They were fighting on a bridge, and being blind with rage, as is often the case, the first thing they knew, over they went into the water. The banks were so high that they were forced to swim some distance, before they came to a landing-place. It was easy for the Newfoundlander,—he was as much at home in the water as a seal. But not so poor Bruce. He struggled and tried his best to swim, but made little headway. Old Bravo (the Newfoundlander) had reached the land, and then turned to look at his old enemy. He saw plainly that his strength was fast failing, and that he was likely to drown. So what should that noble fellow do but plunge in, seize him by the collar, and keeping his nose above water, tow him safely into port. It was funny to see these dogs look at each other as soon as they shook their wet coats. Their glance said as plainly as words "We'll never quarrel any more!" And, sure enough, they kept their resolution. I think some boys might learn a lesson from this old Newfoundland dog.—Presbyterian.

GOING TO BE—WHAT?—We often hear little children in their play tell what they are going to be when they grow up to be men and women. I have overheard them talking on this subject; and some were going to be ministers, some doctors, some lawyers, some teachers, and so on. I once asked a little boy what he was going to be when he grew up to be a man. He looked up into my face, and with a smile replied: "I am going to be good." What a beautiful answer! It is right for us to decide what business we are to adopt; but it is not right for us to be so absorbed in the thought as to forget God, and forget to be good. It takes some people a great while to decide what profession they will follow, wishing to choose the one thing in which they can make the most money. Christ said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

OLD BREAD.—A curious discovery has just been made at Pompeii. In a house in course of excavation, an oven was found closed with an iron door, on opening which a batch of eighty-one loaves, put in nearly eighteen hundred years ago, and somewhat overbaked, was discovered, and even the large iron shovel with which they were neatly laid in rows. The loaves were but slightly overbaked by the lava heat, having been protected by a quantity of ashes covering the door. There is no baker's mark on the loaves; they are circular, about nine inches in diameter, rather flat, and indented (evidently with the baker's elbows) in the centre, and are slightly raised at the sides; and divided by deep lines, radiating from the centre into eight segments. They are now of a deep brown color, and hard, but very light. In the same shop were found 561 bronze and 52 silver coins. A mill with a great quantity of corn in excellent preservation, has also been discovered.

A wording was once visited, in his illness, by a well-meaning but dolorious clergyman, who disfigured his countenance and wore a face of perpetual mourning. As his sad visage appeared in the doorway, the sick man started up and exclaimed:—"Why, what's the matter with you? You look as if your religion didn't agree with you."
