

For two or three weeks Nellie's interest in school did not abate. Then she began to grow a little weary. The weather was getting hot and sultry, and it was tiresome to stay in that close school-room when she wanted so much to be out of doors, chasing butter-flies, and picking wild flowers, or lying on the soft green grass under the shady trees.

One warm, sunny afternoon Emma did not call for her as usual; but Mrs. Burton thought she had learned the way so well that she might be trusted alone er in the right way, and help her to overcome evil thoughts which the wicked spirit shot into her heart. And Nellie prayed, too, that would bless her and make her his own little girl. When her mother left her with a good night kiss, he said, smiling through his tears, "I think I forgive you, dear mother, and I will try never to be so naughty again."

And she kept her word. She never forgot the hour of temptation to go to Jesus, her never-failing friend.
