AUNT JOSEPHINA'S DIAMOND RING.

Now, these words excited Malvina's curiosity or not at all." more than ever, and she insisted on her aunt's telling her all about the ring.

"Well, then, this is the story: When I was only nine years old, and arrangements were making fo my birth-day party, I began to think of who should be invited to it, I wrote down on a piece of paper the names of all my friends—at least with but one exception-whom I wished at the party. Now, there was a very nice girl who was in the habit of coming to see us sometimes, and bringing strawberries and raspberries and other fruit for sale. Her name was Marie, and she was always very neatly dressed, and I was sure that she was a good-hearted, nice girl. She had been furnishing us with different fruits for a number of years, and I had become very much attached to her. But she was a poor girl, did not go into the best society, and, therefore, could hardly be expected to come to my birthday-party. But still I was very anxious to have her, for she was a nice girl, and I thought it might do her a great deal of good to become acquainted with those who belonged to a better class. But then, again, I knew that she would not be very cordially welcomed by some of my other friends, who would turn up their noses at her, and make fun of her, a little straw-berry girl, and perhaps make fun of me for having invited her. So I hit upon this plan: I determined that I would invite Marie to my party to hand around the coffee and cake, and in this way she would have a part of all the nice things, and see how the girls dressed, and hear their conversation, and, perhaps, would be just as well satisfied as if she came as an equal with the rest. "The birthday came, and was passing off splendidly. An event occurred, however, to cast a damper on the pleasant occasion. My mother had been dead five years, and she had owned a magnificent diamond ring. I had begged my father for the permission of showing that ring to my friends at my birthday-party, and when our party was passing along pleasantly, and there seemed to be a little break in the conversation, I took from my pocket the beautiful ring that had belonged to my mother, and showed it to the girl who sat next to me. She admired it very much, then passed it on to another, and then to another, and, finally, it went | you take to drink?" asked a waiter of a young lad around the whole circle.

"Several months passed by after this, and yet no news had been heard of the beautiful diamond ing, that I loved so much, because, as I have said t had belonged to my mother. One morning, I received this letter: I denor -

MY DEAR MISS JOSEPHINA: I have been very sick abed for the last four weeks, and the doctor has said this morning that I shall never get well again. I hope you do not suspect me still of having stolen your beautiful diamond ring. If I ever have done you any wrong, I hope you will forgive me. The ring, you may be sure, was never stolen by me. Do come and see me before I die, for it is not likely that I can live over three or four days longer.

"When I had read this letter, I felt very badly, as you may suppose. I determined that I would go to Marie the next day, and ask her to pardon me for having suspected her of stealing the ring. I was very much afflicted to think that the poor girl to whom I had spoken such hasty words, was about to die, and I lost no time in getting ready to pay her a parting visit. That day, as I was arranging my clothes in the wardrobe, I heard something fall, and make a sharp sound against the bottom of the wardrobe. I looked to see what it was, and there was the beautiful ring which I had told Marie that are larger than many offices of similar condition I believed she had stolen!"

"How the ring should be in the wardrobe was very difficult for me to tell, and even now I cannot fully explain it. This, however, seems to me the best explanation that can be made: The ring; was on the table, where Marie had put it, and it may have caught in a button, or some of the trimming of my dress, and may have hung there during the rest of the day. The dress that I had worn on my birthday was hanging in the wardrobe, and, while arranging my clothes, I may have touched the ring, and loosened its hold from where it was hanging to it was a poor cake when he sent it, and that he the dress, and thus caused it to fall. It was then very plain that Marie had nothing to do with taking the ring, and that really nobody had stolen "Why, my dear Malvina, you ought not to talk it. I now felt worse and worse all the time. There so. Our baker has been serving us with bread and was the poor sick girl, to whom I had spoken cake for seven years, and I have never known him to hastily, and whom I had accused of stealing. I try and take the advantage of us. You have made hastened off to see her as soon as I could. After and we both wept there together. Some years ago a young man, wild, headstrong, profane, and somewhat intemperate, riding through South Hadley, stopped at a store to purchase something, and as the shop-keeper was doing up the little package, he said to the young man : "I don't know you, but I can't help asking if you
