Up through the heavy curtain folds Steals in the morning light, And out beyond I seem to see So many angels bright, And try to think how He must look, . The Lord of Glory there, While, kneeling down, I say to Him My little morning prayer.

How bright the dancing sunbeams are! How sweet the birds and flowers! How fresh the trees and shrubs appear Since last night's April showers! I wonder have they flowers in heaven?

Does rain fall there as here? Do friends on earth so far away Seem always loved and near? And do they know how sad we are-

How much the girls all cried, That dreadful day, so long ago, When darling Nellie died? How cold and dark the cruel ground! How soon the snowflakes fell, To hide the grave we laid her in, Our darling little Nell!

I think these things, you know, sometimes, But never when I pray; For then such thoughts from out my heart

I always drive away. God's angels are around me then; And, floating through the air, They sing sweet songs, while, kneeling here,

I say my morning prayer.

DAVID LIVINGSTONE.

About forty years ago, a poor but bright-looking boy, ten years of age, went to the Blantyre Cotton Works, at Glasgow, Scotland, and asked for work. It was given him, and he had to be at the factory from six o'clock in the morning until eight at night. The inkeeper asked one of them if the other was Very few boys, after having worked so long during the day, would have any desire to study at night, but not so with "Davie," as his companions called him. With a part of his wages he soon purchased a Latin grammar, and in the evening he studied this, and read almost every book he could lay his hands I have known a company to delve at it for an hour. on, except novels. He resolved, further, that he would himself earn the means for doing this, and so he gladly worked in the cotton factory during the summer to support himself while attending medical, Greek, and divinity classes at the Glasgow University in the winter. Such being the spirit of the boy and the young man, need we wonder that "little Davie" of the Blantyre Cotton Works, has become the world-renowned traveller and of gilt articles, it being laid over them with a brush missionary, Dr. Livingstone!

He wished to go as a missionary to China, but the London Missionary Society sent him to South Africa. There he married a good missionary's daughter, and for awhile stayed with his father-in-law. Sometimes he travelled on a bullock; sometimes he went down the river in a canoe, scooped out of the trunk of a tree; and sometimes in a small portable boat. His greatest perils were not from lions, but from men; and these men not the people of the interior, but those near the coast, who had been rendered more base and cruel, and greedy from intercourse with white men.

But though his travels exposed him to almost unparalleled dangers and hardships, he uttered in view of them all this noble sentiment : "These privations true?" are not mentioned as if I consider them in the light of sacrifices. I think the word ought never to be mentioned in reference to anything we can do for Him, 'who, though He was rich, for our sake became poor.'"

During his absence his station was attacked by a savage party of Dutch boers, who sought to kill him, but were disappointed; they destroyed and plundered his premises. Mark the pilgrim spirit in which he regarded the spoiling of his goods: "The losses we have sustained amount to upwards of fifteen hundred dollars. We shall move the more lightly now that we can put all our goods into one wagon." In four years he travelled eleven thousand miles, where no white man ever went before; and, as you suppose, when he returned to his own land, he brought a great deal of interesting and important knowledge about the interior of Africa. He was gone from England sixteen years, and scarcely spoke English in all that time. And though not quite forty years old, his face, when he reached England, was wrinkled and almost black through exposure and

He received a warm welcome in his native land. All delighted to do him honor. Thousands attended the meetings which he addressed, and tens of thou sands bought the book which he wrote about his wonderful travels. The professors and the student: at Cambridge and Oxford universities were so deeply interested in his statements, that they formed a new missionary society to carry the gospel into the land which Dr. Livingstone had visited, which they calle the " English Universities' Mission to Central Africa.' Several missionaries of this society are now laborin, in Africa. -S. S. Star.

VERBAL AMBIGUITIES .- The ambiguity of word and phrases is the occasion of numerous misappre hensions, puzzles and absurdities in current litera ture, a few examples of which may be entertaining Referring first to puzzles, we may mention the cas of the man who had six children, and had never see. one of them. The mind is misled here by supposin that "one of them" means any of them, and if i had been said, never saw a single one of them, i would have been atill more likely to be misunder stood. The answer to this puzzle is, that one o them had been born while the man was on a journey eren, Patrick and he had not seen it.

There is a puzzle well known to the rising generation, which runs nearly in this fashion: "There wa a poor blind beggar who had a brother; the brother died, but the man who died had no brother. Wha relation was the beggar to the man who died?" Here we are misled by taking it for granted that the beggar must have been a man, but the clew bein given that the beggar was a girl, it becomes quit plain that the beggar was a sister of the man wh
